THE EXPLOITS OF ARSÈNE LUPIN

Arsène Lupin, gentleman cambrioleur or amateur cracksmen, is the French counterpart of Hornung's Raffles, an outlaw who outwits the police every time. Though there are plenty of corpses in the stories Lupin himself is a thief, never a killer. He succeeds by intelligence, intuition and consummate timing. His author creates a marvellous world deliberately remote from reality—a world contemporary with Sherlock Holmes, who himself appears in a disguised form (as Holmlock Shears) in many of the stories and novels. The great master-criminal made his bow in this collection of stories, which was first published in 1907. The Exploits of Arsène Lupin became a huge success and was followed by a number of sequels. One of these was The Hollow Needle, a full-length novel, which is being reissued as a companion volume, also with an introduction by Maurice Richardson. The qualities of suspense and imagination in writing make both the books as compelling today as when they first appeared.

INTRODUCTION

By Maurice Richardson

A SCHOOL sanatorium fever-bed is ideal for bringing out the quality of a thriller. I first read The Exploits of Arsène Lupin during an attack of measles.

I was instantly captivated. The 'Gentleman-Cambrioleur'—this was his author, Maurice Leblanc's equivalent of the English term amateur cracksman—seemed to me to combine the dashing Gallic élan of D'Artagnan with the delicious up to date illegality of Raffles. Lupin's personality gave out a powerful aura of elation, an infectious euphoria that permeated right through the book. He had a mythical fantastic quality of elusiveness. He carried the use of disguise further than any of the characters in crime-fiction. He was "by turns chauffeur, opera-singer, bookmaker, gilded youth, young man, old man, Marseillaise bagman, Russian doctor, Spanish bullfighter". Part of the suspense which he generated was due to the reader's not knowing which of the characters at the beginning of the story would turn out to be Lupin in disguise. You waited in eager anticipation for him to reveal himself. Nobody, not even Buchan's Graf von Schwäbing, can have had such a large wardrobe and wig cupboard.

Re-reading Arsène Lupin now, so many years and one more world war later, I am delighted to find how fresh he seems. He carries his period with him across half a century; it is rare for such an openly popular piece of writing to be able to do this. As a character the secret of his appeal is perhaps his combination of panache with authority. Even when he is carrying out the most gigantic robberies he gives you the impression that he is somehow in the right. The most sensational of all his feats is his great escape from prison which you will find in Chapter 3 of 'The Exploits'. This is a tremendous coup of double bluff which, for the sake of the new generations of readers who know not Lupin, I had better not reveal. It is preposterous, of course, but it remains wonderfully exhilarating, a first class piece of prestidigitation in print.

Lupin was not an entirely original creation. None of the great figures of crime fiction are. He was conceived deliberately as a Gallic Raffles. Crime fiction has been aptly called the folk myth of modern urban civilisation and crime writers certainly borrow from each other like folk-bards. In this case there is some French national pride to be taken into account. Conan Doyle, the French school maintained, had begun the transactions by borrowing several of the Holmes devices from Gaboriau and covering up, making Holmes denounce Gaboriau's detective Lecoq as "a miserable bungler". Hornung was Doyle's brother-in-law; it was all in the family. Sometimes the resemblance seems as if it is going to become very close, as in the opening of the second chapter of 'The Exploits'. Arsène Lupin is detected and arrested on board a liner with a beautiful Australian on board. Much the same happened to Raffles and Bunny in the story of the Emperor's Pearl which they stole from the German officer's cabin. In fact, the resemblance to the British school is always superficial. It becomes even more superficial when Inspector Ganimard, in despair at being persistently outwitted by Lupin, calls in the great British detective, Holmlock Shears.

When as a boy I first read Arsène Lupin the prospect of the duel between the French master criminal and the sage of Baker Street promised double value. I was rather disappointed to see what a travesty of Holmes appeared. Re-reading him to-day I am amused to note Leblanc's typically French reaction. Holmes was in the great tradition of the English eccentrics. Leblanc's travesty, Holmlock Shears, is an example of the way the French liked to picture the English, exaggerating their ponderous gravity, the size of their teeth, the length of their silences, the slowness of their movements, the infinitude of their hypocrisy. It reminds you rather of a personal experience of Maupassant's described in the Goncourt Journals. He was sitting in a railway carriage rumbling through Normandy. The other occupants were five huge Englishmen who sat in silence. Suddenly, still in silence but in unison, as if obeying a military command, they lowered their newspapers, took out their watches and wound them up. It was a conception that dates from before the Entente Cordiale. In The Hollow Needle, which is being published as a companion volume to The Exploits of Arsène Lupin, Holmlock Shears appears again and behaves in a positively sinister fashion.

Now for something about the author. First let me try to place him in his background. The supply of native crime fiction in France has never been so copious as in Britain and America. To-day, in spite of Simenon's huge output, French crime fiction addicts depend to a large extent on translations. At one time it was suggested that the French bourgeoisie had better ways of spending their leisure than the British, and that owing to their more highly developed taste in food, wine, conversation, and love affairs, they had less need of ready-made daydreams for delinquents. They could take the Roman policier or leave it alone.

The 19th century French crime writers were mostly feuilletonistes who wrote serials for daily newspapers at high speed. This can be excellent training; Balzac began by doing it. But few of their names are remembered on either side of the Channel. There was Eugène Sue whose huge sprawling underworld romance Les Mystères de Paris was among Karl Marx's favourite light reading. There was Gaboriau (1833-1873) whom I have already mentioned with his great detective, Lecoq, who was modelled on Vidocq, the famous real life French master criminal at the beginning of the century who changed sides and founded the Sûreté and who was also the inspiration of Balzac's famous character Vautrin. There was Gaboriau's disciple and heir, Fortuné Hippolyte Auguste de Boisgobey who carried on with Lecoq's adventures after his master's death. And there was Gaston Leroux (1868-1897) creator of Rouletabille, a journalistic detective with a Watsonian stooge. Leroux's books, particularly 'The Mystery of the Yellow Room,' had some success in translation but not as much as those of his contemporary Leblanc, with whom his name is often bracketed.

Maurice Leblanc, the creator if not the only begetter of Arsène Lupin, was born in Rouen in 1864 of Franco-Italian parentage and died in Perpignan in 1911. He was a middle-sized, lively, friendly man, bald in front with a big dark moustache under a big nose.

Leblanc was a journalist. He liked to write at café tables in the open air. He was a keen chess player, and a bit of an intellectual. His sister was Georgette Leblanc, the actress who was the companion of Maeterlinck and acted in many of his plays. This connection explains how Teixeira de Mattos, who translated some of Maeterlinck into English, also translated most of Leblanc.

Leblanc's literary enthusiasms included Balzac and Poe. He had written several straight novels without much success. In 1906 the editor of the new periodical Je Sais Tout asked him on the spur of the moment to try his hand at a thriller serial and Arsène Lupin—Gentleman-Cambrioleur was born. He was an immediate success. Further volumes of adventures came out at regular intervals. Lupin became a French national hero and his author was awarded the Legion of Honour.

In the early stories Lupin plays a more or less exclusively criminal role although his code of honour is very strict. He only expropriates the millionaire or the institution. He avoids violence as much as possible, never kills. As the saga expanded his development followed the career of Vidocq, to whom French crime fiction owes so much. In the later books he becomes more and more of a detective, correcting the blundering police by brilliant feats of ratiocination and ending up entirely on the side of law and order, a pillar of society. Most of the books in the Lupin canon are episodic chronicles like The Exploits of Arsène Lupin in which the Gentleman-Cambrioleur made his first bow. There are, however, some complete novels of which The Hollow Needle, the companion volume in this revival, is one. It shows Lupin in a particularly gallant, indeed devoted role. His hidden collection of stolen works of art is a grandiose conception, worth waiting for. The pace, as in all Lupin stories, is very fast.

It is easy, I think, to see why Arsène Lupin was a best seller in his day, and I hope he may catch on in revival after half a century. His adventures are full of action and though the plots are loose and the story lines look like the temperature charts of septicæmia cases, there is always suspense and an atmosphere of fantasy to make the incredible credible. I can recommend him as a delightful period piece. He belongs to a unique all too short era, the years between the beginning of the century and the first world war, what we call in England the Edwardian afterglow. It was a time when, for those who could afford them, comfort and luxury had reached a peak which has not been surpassed and probably never will be. A lot of things were still hand-made and you did not need to be a billionaire to be a connoisseur. Even little petit bourgeois persons cherished their palates, still drank brandy and soda and smoked only Turkish or Egyptian cigarettes. At the same time there was enough speed to make possible the rapid tempo of the modern thriller. There were still hansoms and flies but there were motor-cars, and a chase at fifty miles per hour, goggled and dust-coated in a bosomy De Dion Bouton over bad roads across country that was still 'bien sauvage' remains more exciting than blinding monotonously along M.1 at a hundred and thirty. As for the trains, they went faster than they do now, in Britain anyway. This was the world, the short-lived best of both worlds, pre-war, pre-Russian revolution, though not of course pre-anarchist, pre-Americanisation, where Arsène Lupin was the light reading, a volatile aromatic blend of romance and excitement, not, of course, to be taken too seriously. I hope these revivals will show that the French and English reading publics of half a century ago knew what was what.

THE SEVEN OF HEARTS

THE SEVEN OF HEARTS

I HAVE often been asked this question :

“How did you first come to know Arsène Lupin?”

No one doubts that I know him. The numberless details which I give of his bewildering personality, the undeniable facts which I set forth, the fresh proofs which I supply, the interpretation which I provide of certain acts of which others have seen but the outward manifestations, without fathoming their secret reasons or their invisible mechanism : all this points, if not to intimacy, which Lupin's very existence would make impossible, at least to friendly relations and an uninterrupted confidence.

But how did I come to know him? Why was I favoured to the extent of becoming his biographer? Why I rather than another?

The answer presents no difficulty : accident alone determined a selection in which my personal merit goes for nothing. It was accident that threw me across his path. It was by accident that I was mixed up in one of his most curious and mysterious adventures, by accident, lastly, that I became an actor in the drama of which he was the wonderful stage-manager, an obscure and complicated drama bristling with such extraordinary catastrophes that I feel a certain perplexity as I sit down to describe them.

The first act passes in the course of that famous night of the twenty-second of June which has been so much discussed. And I may as well at once confess that I attribute my somewhat abnormal conduct on that occasion to the very peculiar condition of mind in which I found myself when I returned home. I had been dining with friends at the Restaurant de la Cascade, and, throughout the evening, while we sat smoking and listening to the Hungarian band and its melancholy waltzes, we had talked of nothing but murders and robberies, of lurid and terrifying plots. This is always a bad preparation for sleep.

The Saint-Martins had driven away in their motor-car. Jean Daspry—the charming, reckless Daspry, who was to meet his death six months later in so tragic a fashion on the Morocco frontier—Jean Daspry and I walked back in the dark, hot night. When we reached the little house at Neuilly, on the Boulevard Maillot, where I had been living for the past twelve months, he said:

“Do you never feel frightened?”

“What a notion!”

“Well, this little house of yours is very lonely: no neighbours . . . surrounded by waste land . . . I’m no coward, as you know. And yet . . .”

“By Jove, you’re in a cheerful mood to-night!”

“Oh, I said that as I might have said anything else. The Saint-Martins have depressed me with their stories about burglars and highwaymen.”

We shook hands and Daspry walked away. I took out my key and opened the door:

“That’s pleasant,” I muttered. “Antoine has forgotten to leave a lighted candle for me.”

And suddenly I remembered: Antoine was out; I had given him his night off.

I at once resented the darkness and the silence. I groped my way upstairs to my room as quickly as I could, and, contrary to my custom, turned the key in the door and shot the bolt.

The light of the candle restored my presence of mind. Nevertheless, I was careful to take my revolver, a big, long-range revolver from its case, and place it beside my bed. This precaution completed my composure. I went to bed and, as usual, took up the book that lay on my night-table to read myself to sleep.

A great surprise awaited me. In the place of the paper-cutter with which I had marked my page the night before I now found an envelope sealed with five red seals. I seized it eagerly. It was addressed in my name, accompanied by the word "Urgent".

A letter! A letter addressed to me! Who could have put it there? Somewhat nervously I tore open the envelope and read:

"From the moment when you open this letter, whatever happens, whatever you may hear, do not stir, do not make a movement, do not utter a sound. If you do, you are lost."

Now I am no coward either, and I know as well as another how a man should bear himself in the presence of real danger, or smile at the fanciful perils that alarm our imagination. But I repeat I was in an abnormal and easily impressionable frame of mind; my nerves were on edge. Besides, was there not something perturbing in all this, something inexplicable, enough to trouble the most undaunted soul?

My fingers feverishly pressed the sheet of note-paper and my eyes incessantly read and re-read the threatening words:

". . . do not make a movement, do not utter a sound. If you do, you are lost."

"Nonsense!" I thought. "It's a joke, a silly trick."

I was on the point of laughing, I even tried to laugh aloud. What was it prevented me? What vague fear compressed my throat?

At least, I would blow out the candle. No, I could not blow it out:

"Not a movement, or you are lost," said the letter.

But why struggle against this kind of auto-suggestion, which is often more urgent than the most precise facts? There was nothing to do but close my eyes. I closed my eyes.

At that moment, a light sound passed through the silence, followed by a creaking noise. It seemed to me to come from a large adjoining room which I had fitted up as a study and from which I was separated only by the passage.

The approach of real danger excited me and I felt that I was going to jump up, seize my revolver and rush into the other room. I did not jump up: one of the curtains of the left-hand window had moved before my eyes.

There was no doubt possible: it had moved. It was still moving! And I saw—oh, I distinctly saw—that in that narrow space between the curtains and the window there stood a human form, the thickness of which prevented the material from hanging straight down.

And the being saw me, too; it was certain that he could see me through the wide meshes of the stuff. Then I understood all. While the others were carrying off their booty, his mission consisted in terrorising me. Jump out of bed? Seize a revolver? It was impossible . . . he was there! At the least movement, at the least sound, I was lost.

A violent blow shook the house, followed by smaller blows, in twos and threes, like those of a hammer driving in tacks and rebounding. Or, at least, that was what I imagined in the confusion of my brain. And other noises followed in between, a regular din of different noises which proved that my visitors were doing as they pleased and acting in all security.

They were right: I did not budge. Was it cowardice? No, annihilation rather, a complete incapacity to move a single muscle. Prudence also; for, after all, why struggle? Behind that man were ten others, who would come at his call. Was it worth while to risk my life to save a few hangings and knick-knacks?

And this torture lasted all night long: an intolerable torture, a terrible agony! The noise had stopped, but I never ceased waiting for it to begin again! And the man, the man who stood there watching me, weapon in hand! My terrified gaze never left him! And my heart beat and the perspiration streamed from my forehead and my whole body!

Suddenly, I was pervaded by an unspeakable sense of relief: a milk-cart, of which I knew the clatter well, passed!

along the boulevard; and at the same time, I received the impression that the dawn was filtering through the drawn blinds and that a glimmer of daylight from the outside was mingling with the darkness within.

And the light entered my room. And other vehicles passed. And all the phantoms of the night vanished.

Then I put one arm out of bed, slowly, stealthily. Opposite me, nothing stirred. With my eyes I noted the fold in the curtain, the exact spot at which to take aim; I made a precise calculation of the movements which I should have to make: I grasped the revolver; and I fired.

I sprang out of bed, with a shout of deliverance, and leapt at the curtain. There was a hole through the material and a hole in the pane behind it. As for the man, I had missed him . . . for the very good reason that there was no one there.

No one! And so, all night long, I had been hypnotised by a fold in a curtain! And, during that time, criminals had . . . Furiously, with an impulse which nothing could have stopped, I turned the key in the lock, opened my door, crossed the passage, opened another door and rushed into the room.

But a feeling of stupefaction rooted me to the threshold, panting, dumbfounded even more astonished than I had been by the absence of the man: nothing had disappeared! All the things which I had expected to find gone—furniture, pictures, old silks and velvets—all these things were in their places!

It was an incomprehensible sight. I could not believe my eyes. And yet that din, those noises of moving furniture. . . . I went all round the room, inspected the walls, took an inventory of all the objects which I knew so well. There was not a thing missing! And what disconcerted me most of all was that nothing revealed the passing of the evil-doers, not a sign, not a chair out of place, not a footmark.

“Come, come,” I said, clasping my head with my two hands. "After all, I'm not a madman. I heard what I heard! . . ."

I examined the room inch by inch, employing the most minute methods of investigation. It was to no purpose. Or, rather . . . but could I consider that a discovery? Under a small Persian rug, flung down on the floor, I picked up a card, a playing-card. It was a seven of hearts, similar to the seven of hearts in any French pack of cards; but it attracted my attention because of rather a curious detail. The extreme lower end of each of the seven red, heart-shaped pips was pierced with a hole, the round and regular hole made by the point of an awl.

That and no more! A card; and a letter found in a book. Beyond that, nothing. Was this enough to avouch that I had not been the sport of a dream?

I pursued my investigations throughout the day. It was a large-sized room, out of all proportion with the general smallness of the house, and its decoration bore witness to the eccentric taste of the man who had designed it. The floor was made of a mosaic of tiny, parti-coloured stones, forming large symmetrical patterns. The walls were covered with a similar mosaic, arranged in panels representing Pompeian allegories, Byzantine compositions, mediæval frescoes. A Bacchus sat astride a barrel. An emperor with a golden crown and a flowing beard held a sword uplifted in his right hand.

High up in the wall was the one huge window, something like the window of a studio. It was always left open at night; and the probability was that the men had entered by it, with the aid of a ladder. But here again there was no certainty. The posts of the ladder must have left marks on the trodden ground of the yard: there were no such marks. The grass of the waste land surrounding the house would have been freshly trampled: it was not.

I confess that the idea of applying to the police never entered my head, so inconsistent and absurd were the facts, which I should have had to lay before them. They would have laughed at me. But the next day but one was the day for my column in the Gil Blas, for which I was then writing. Obsessed as I was by my adventure, I described it at full length.

My article attracted some little attention, but I could see that it was not taken seriously and that it was looked upon as a fanciful rather than a true story. The Saint-Martins chaffed me about it. Daspry, however, who was something of an expert in these matters, came to see me, made me explain the whole case to him and studied it . . . but with no more success than myself.

A few mornings later, the bell at the front gate rang and Antoine came to tell me that a gentleman wished to speak to me. He had refused to give his name. I asked him up.

He was a man of about forty, with a very dark complexion and strongly-marked features; and his clothes, which, though greatly worn, were neat and clean, proclaimed a taste for fashion that contrasted with his manners, which were rather common.

Coming straight to the point, he said, in a grating voice and in an accent that confirmed my opinion of the man's social standing:

"I have been away, sir, and I picked up the Gil Blas at a café. I read your article. It interested me . . . immensely."

"I thank you."

"And I came back."

"Really?"

"Yes, to see you. Are all the facts which you described correct?"

"Absolutely correct."

"Is there not a single one invented by yourself?"

"Not one."

"In that case I may have some information to give you."

"Pray speak."

"No."

"How do you mean?"

"Before saying more I must make sure that I am right."

"And to do that . . . ?"

"I must remain alone in this room."

I looked at him in surprise :

"I don't quite see . . ."

"It's an idea that came to me on reading your article. Certain details establish a really remarkable coincidence between your adventure and another which was revealed to me by chance. If I am wrong it would be better for me to keep silence. And the only way of finding out is for me to remain alone . . ."

What was there underlying this proposal? Later, I remembered that, in making it, the man wore an uneasy air, an anxious look. But, at the time, although feeling a little astonished, I saw nothing particularly abnormal in his request. And, besides, his curiosity stimulated me.

I replied :

"Very well. How long do you want?"

"Oh, three minutes, that's all. I shall join you in three minutes from now."

I left the room and went downstairs. I took out my watch. One minute passed. Two minutes . . . What gave me that sense of oppression? Why did those moments seem to me more solemn than any others? . . .

Two minutes and a half . . . Two minutes and three-quarters . . . And, suddenly, I heard a shot.

I rushed up the stairs in half a dozen strides and entered the room. A cry of horror escaped me.

The man lay motionless, on his left side, in the middle of the floor. Blood trickled from his head, mingled with portions of brains. A smoking revolver lay close by his hand.

He gave a single convulsion and that was all.

But there was something that struck me even more than this awful sight, something that was the cause of my not at once calling out for help or flinging myself on my knees to see if the man was still breathing. At two paces from him, a seven of hearts lay on the floor!

I picked it up. The lower point of each of the seven pips was pierced with a hole.

Half an hour later, the commissary of police of Neuilly arrived, followed, in a few moments, by the divisional surgeon and by M. Dudouis, the head of the detective-service. I had been careful not to touch the corpse. There was nothing to interfere with their first observations.

These were brief, the more so as, at the beginning, the officers discovered nothing, or very little. There were no papers in the dead man's pockets, no name on his clothes, no initials on his linen. In short, there was no clue whatever to his identity.

And, in the room itself, the same order prevailed as before. The furniture had not been moved, the different objects were all in their old places. And yet the man had not come to see me with the sole intention of killing himself, or because he considered my house better suited than another for the purpose of committing suicide! There must have been some motive to drive him to this act of despair; and this motive must have resulted from some new fact ascertained by himself in the course of the three minutes which he had spent alone.

But what fact? What had he seen? What had he discovered? What frightful secret had he surprised? It was impossible to say.

At the last moment, however, an incident occurred which seemed to us of great importance. Two policemen were stooping to lift the corpse, prior to removing it on a stretcher, when they perceived that the left hand, till then closed and shrunk, had become relaxed; and a crumpled visiting-card fell from it. The card bore the words :

GEORGES ANDERMATT

37, Rue de Berry

What did this mean? Georges Andermatt was a big Paris banker, the founder and chairman of the Metal Exchange, which has done so much to forward the prospects of the metal-trade in France. He lived in great style, kept a drag, motor-cars, a racing-stable. His parties were much frequented and Madame Andermatt was well known for her charm and beauty.

"Could that be the man's name?" I murmured.

The head of the detective-service bent over the corpse :

"No. Monsieur Andermatt is a pale-faced man, with hair just turning grey."

"But why that card?"

"Have you a telephone, sir?"

"Yes, in the hall. If you will come this way . . ."

He turned up the directory and asked for number 415.21 :

"Is Monsieur Andermatt in? . . . My name is Dudouis. . . . Please ask him to come with all speed to No. 102, Boulevard Maillot. It's urgent."

Twenty minutes later, M. Andermatt stepped out of his car. He was told the reason why he had been sent for and was then taken upstairs to see the body.

He had a momentary emotion that contracted his features and said, in an undertone, as though involuntarily :

"Étienne Varin."

"Do you know him?"

"No . . . or, at least, yes . . . but only by sight. His brother . . ."

"He has a brother?"

"Yes, Alfred Varin. . . . His brother used to come and ask me to assist him . . . I forget in what connection. . . ."

"Where does he live?"

"The two brothers used to live together . . . in the Rue de Provence, I think."

"And have you no suspicion of the reason why he shot himself?"

"None at all."

"Still, he was holding your card in his hand . . . your card, with your name and address."

"I can't understand it. It's obviously a mere accident, which the enquiry will explain."

It was, in any case, a very curious accident, I thought, and I felt that ~~we~~ all received the same impression.

I noticed this impression again in the next morning's papers and among all my friends with whom I discussed the adventure. Amid the mysteries that complicated it, after the renewed and disconcerting discovery of that seven of hearts seven times pierced, after the two incidents, each as puzzling as the other, of which my house had been the scene, that visiting-card seemed at last to promise a glimpse of light. By its means they would arrive at the truth.

But, contrary to expectation, M. Andermatt furnished not a single clue:

"I have said all I know," he repeated. "What can I do more? I was the first to be thunderstruck by the fact that my card was found where it was; and, like everybody else, I expect this point to be cleared up."

It was not cleared up. The enquiry established that the Varins were two brothers, of Swiss origin, who had led a very chequered life under different aliases, frequenting gambling-houses and connected with a whole gang of foreigners, whose movements had been watched and who had dispersed after a series of burglaries in which their participation was not proved until later. At No. 24, Rue de Provence, where the brothers Varin had, in point of fact, lived six years previously, no one knew what had become of them.

I confess that, for my part, the case seemed to me ~~so~~ intricate that I scarcely believed in the possibility of a solution; and I tried hard to banish it from my mind. But Jean Daspry, on the contrary—and I saw a great deal of him at that time—grew daily more enthusiastic about it.

It ~~was~~ he that called my attention to the following paragraph from a foreign paper, which was reproduced and commented upon throughout the press of the country:

"A new submarine is to be tried shortly, in the presence of the Emperor. It is claimed on behalf of this vessel that her class will revolutionise the conditions of naval warfare in the future. The place of the trial will be kept secret until the last moment; but the name of the submarine has leaked out, through an indiscretion in official circles: she is called the Seven of Hearts."

The Seven of Hearts! Was this a chance coincidence? Or did it establish a link between the name of the new submarine and the incidents which I have related? But what sort of link? Surely, there could be no possible connection between what was happening here and in Germany?

"How do you know?" said Daspry. "The most incongruous effects often arise from one and the same cause."

Two days later, another piece of news was reprinted from the German papers:

"It is now contended that the Seven of Hearts, the submarine whose trials are to take place immediately, was designed by French engineers. These engineers, after vainly seeking the support of their own government, are said to have applied next, and with no more success, to the British Admiralty. We need hardly say that we publish this statement with all reserve."

I dare not lay too much stress upon facts of an extremely delicate character, which provoked considerable excitement, as the reader will remember, in France. Nevertheless, since all danger of international complications is now removed, I must speak of an article in the Écho de France which made a great stir at the time and which threw a more or less vague light upon the "Seven of Hearts Affair," as it was called.

Here it is, as it appeared under the signature of "SALVATOR":

"THE SEVEN OF HEARTS AFFAIR

"A CORNER OF THE VEIL RAISED

"We will be brief. Ten years ago, Louis Lacombe, a young mining engineer, wishing to devote his time and money to the studies which he was pursuing, resigned his appointment and hired a small house, No. 102, Boulevard Maillot, which had recently been built and decorated by an Italian nobleman. Through the intermediation of two brothers called Varin, of Lausanne, one of whom assisted him in his experiments, while the other went in search of financial backers for his schemes, Lacombe entered into relations with M. Georges Andermatt, who had then just founded the Paris Metal Exchange.

"After a number of interviews, he succeeded in interesting M. Andermatt in the plans of a submarine upon which he was engaged; and it was understood that, as soon as the invention had been perfected, M. Andermatt would employ his influence to persuade the Minister of Marine to grant a series of trials.

"For two years, Louis Lacombe was constantly visiting the Hotel Andermatt and submitting his improvements to the banker, until the day came when, having lighted upon the final formula which he was seeking and being fully satisfied with his labours, he asked M. Andermatt to set to work on his side.

"On that day, Louis Lacombe dined at the Andermatts'. He left the house at half-past eleven in the evening. Since then, he has not been seen by mortal eyes.

"On reading the newspapers of the day, we find that the young man's family called in the police and that the public prosecutor took the matter up. But the enquiries led to nothing; and it was generally believed that Louis Lacombe, who was looked upon as an eccentric and whimsical young fellow, had gone abroad without informing any of his friends of his intentions.

"If we accept this somewhat improbable suggestion, one question remains, a question of supreme importance to the country: what became of the plans of the submarine? Did Louis Lacombe take them with him? Were they destroyed?

"We have caused the most serious investigations to be made, resulting in the conclusion that the plans are in existence. The brothers Varin have had them in their hands. How did they acquire possession of them? This we have not yet succeeded in establishing, any more than we know why they did not try to sell them sooner. They may have feared lest they should be asked whence they obtained them. In any case, this fear subsided in course of time and we are in the position to state for certain that Louis Lacombe's plans are now the property of a foreign power and, if necessary, to publish the letters exchanged in this connection between the representatives of that power and the brothers Varin. At the moment of writing, the Seven of Hearts invented by Louis Lacombe has been brought into existence by our neighbours.

"Will the reality answer the optimistic expectations of the men implicated in this act of treason? We have reasons to hope the contrary, and we flatter ourselves that these reasons will be justified by the event."

And a postscript added :

"Our hopes were well-grounded. Private information received at the moment of going to press enables us to state that the trials of the Seven of Hearts have not proved satisfactory. It is quite probable that the plans delivered by the Varins lacked the last document which Louis Lacombe brought to M. Andermatt on the evening of his disappearance, a document which ~~was~~ essential to the complete understanding of the project, a sort of summary of the definite conclusions, valuations and measurements contained in the other papers. Without this document, the plans remain imperfect, even as the document is useless without the plans.

"There is, therefore, still time to take action and to recover what belongs to us. In undertaking this very difficult task we rely greatly upon the assistance of M. Andermatt. He will be anxious to explain the apparently inexplicable conduct which he has maintained from the first. He will say not only why he did not tell what he knew at the time of Étienne Varin's suicide, but also why he never mentioned the disappearance of the papers of which he had had cognisance. He will also say why, for the past six years, he has had the brothers Varin watched by detectives in his pay.

"We look to him for deeds, not words. If not . . ."

The article ended with this brutal threat. But what force did it possess? What means of intimidation could Salvator, the anonymous writer of the article, hope to exercise over M. Andermatt?

A host of reporters swept down upon the banker, and a dozen interviews described the scorn with which he rejected the insinuations that seemed to put him on his defence. Thereupon the correspondent of the Echo de France retorted with these lines:

"M. Andermatt may like it or dislike it; but, from to-day, he is our collaborator in the work which we have undertaken."

On the day when this rejoinder appeared, Daspry and I dined together. After dinner, with the newspapers spread out on my table before us, we discussed the case and went into it from every point of view, with the irritation which a man would feel if he were walking indefinitely in the dark and constantly stumbling over the same obstacles.

Suddenly—for the bell had not rung—the door opened and a lady, covered with a thick veil, entered unannounced.

I at once rose to meet her. She said :

“Are you the gentleman that lives here?”

“Yes, madame, but I am bound to say . . .”

“The gate on the boulevard was open,” she explained.

“But the hall-door?”

She made no reply; and I reflected that she must have gone round by the tradesmen’s entrance. Then she knew the way?

A rather embarrassing silence ensued. She looked at Daspry. I introduced him to her mechanically, as I would have done in a drawing-room. Then I offered her a chair and asked her to tell me the object of her visit.

She raised her veil and I saw that she was dark, with regular features, and that, though not very pretty, she possessed an infinite charm, which came, above all, from her eyes, her grave, sad eyes.

She said, simply :

“I am Madame Andermatt.”

“Madame Andermatt!” I repeated, more and more surprised.

There was a fresh pause. And she resumed, in a calm voice and an exceedingly quiet manner :

“I have come about that matter . . . which you know of. I thought that perhaps you might be able to give me some particulars. . . .”

“Upon my word, madame, I know no more about it than what has appeared in the papers. Please tell me precisely how I can be of use to you.”

“I don’t know . . . I don’t know . . .”

It was only then that I received an intuition that her calmness ~~was~~ assumed and that a great agitation lay hidden under this air of perfect composure. And we were silent, both equally embarrassed.

But Daspry, who had never ceased watching her, came up to her and said:

"Will you allow me to put a few questions to you, madame?"

"Oh, yes!" she cried. "I will speak, if you do that."

"You will speak . . . whatever the questions may be?"

"Whatever they may be."

He reflected and asked:

"Did you know Louis Lacombe?"

"Yes, through my husband."

"When did you see him last?"

"On the evening when he dined with us."

"On that evening, did anything lead you to think that you would never see him again?"

"No. He said something about a journey to Russia, but it was only a vague allusion."

"So you expected to see him soon?"

"Yes, the next day but one, at dinner."

"And how do you account for his disappearance?"

"I can't account for it."

"And Monsieur Andermatt?"

"I don't know."

"Still . . ."

"Don't ask me about that."

"The article in the Echo de France seems to suggest . . ."

"What it seems to suggest is that the brothers Varin had something to do with his disappearance."

"Is that your own opinion?"

"Yes."

"On what do you base your conviction?"

"When Louis Lacombe left us he was carrying a portfolio containing all the papers relating to his scheme. Two days after, my husband and one of the Varins, the one who is still alive, had an interview, in the course of which my husband acquired the certain knowledge that those papers were in the hands of the two brothers."

"And he did not lodge an information?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because there was something in the portfolio besides Louis Lacombe's papers."

"What was that?"

She hesitated, made as though to answer, and, finally, kept silence. Daspry continued :

"So that is the reason why your husband had the two brothers watched, without informing the police? He hoped to recover both the papers and that other . . . compromising thing, owing to which the two brothers levied a sort of blackmail on him."

"On him . . . and on me."

"Ah, on you, too?"

"On me principally."

She uttered these three words in a dull voice. Daspry observed her, took a few steps aside and, returning to her :

"Used you to write to Louis Lacombe?"

"Certainly . . . my husband had business . . ."

"Apart from those official letters, did you not write Louis Lacombe . . . any other letters? . . . Forgive me for insisting, but it is essential that I should know the whole truth. Did you write any other letters?"

She turned very red and murmured :

"Yes."

"And are those the letters which the brothers Varin had in their possession?"

"Yes."

"So Monsieur Andermatt knows?"

"He never saw them, but Alfred Varin told him of their existence and threatened to publish them if my husband took action. My husband was afraid. . . . He dreaded a scandal."

"Only, he did all he could to get the letters from them?"

"He did all he could . . . at least, I presume so; for, ever since the day of that last interview with Alfred Varin and after the few very violent words in which he told me of it, there has been no intimacy, no confidence between my husband and myself. We live together like two strangers."

"In that case, if you have nothing to lose, what do you fear?"

"However indifferent I may have become to him, I am the woman he once loved the woman he could still have loved—oh, I am certain of that!" she whispered, in an eager voice. "He would still have loved me, if he had not obtained possession of those accursed letters."

"What! Did he succeed? . . . But surely the two brothers were on their guard?"

"Yes; and it seems that they even used to boast of having a safe hiding-place."

"Well?"

"I have every reason to believe that my husband has discovered the hiding-place."

"Not really! Where was it?"

"Here."

I started:

"Here!"

"Yes; and I always suspected it. Louis Lacombe, who was very clever and had a passion for mechanics, used to amuse himself, in his spare time, by constructing locks and safes. The brothers Varin must have discovered one of those receptacles and used it afterwards for the purpose of hiding the letters . . . and other things as well, no doubt."

"But they did not live here!" I exclaimed.

"This house stood empty until your arrival, four months ago. They probably, therefore, used to come here; and they will have thought, moreover, that your presence need not hinder them on the day when they might want to withdraw all their papers. But they reckoned without my husband, who, on the night of the twenty-second of June, forced the safe, took . . . what he was looking for—and left his card behind him to make it quite clear to the two brothers that the tables were turned and that he no longer had any cause to fear them. Two days later, after seeing your article in the Gil Blas, Étienne Varin came to call on you in hot haste, was left alone in this room, found the safe empty . . . and shot himself."

After a moment's silence, Daspry asked:

"This is mere conjecture, is it not? Has Monsieur Andermatt said anything to you?"

"No."

"Has his attitude towards you changed? Has he seemed to you to be brooding or betrayed any anxiety?"

"No."

"And don't you think that he would, if he had found the letters? For my part, I don't believe that he has them. In my opinion, it was someone else who entered here."

"But who can it have been?"

"The mysterious person who is managing this business, who holds all the threads of it, and who is directing it towards an object of which we can only catch a glimpse through all these complications; the mysterious person whose invisible and all-powerful action has been felt from the start. It was he and his friends who entered this house on the twenty-second of June, it was he who discovered the hiding-place, it was he who left Monsieur Andermatt's card behind him, it is he who has the correspondence of the brothers Varin and the proofs of their treason in his keeping."

"But who is this 'he,' " I broke in, with some impatience.

"Why, the correspondent of the Echo de France, of course: Salvator! Isn't the evidence overpowering? Doesn't the article give details that could be known only to the man who had fathomed the secrets of the two brothers?"

"In that case," stammered Madame Andermatt, in dismay, "he has my letters as well and he will threaten my husband in his turn! What, in heaven's name, am I to do?"

"Write to him," said Daspry, plainly. "Confide in him straight out, tell him all that you know and all that you can learn."

"What!"

"Your interests and his are identical. It is beyond all question that he is acting against the survivor of the two brothers. He is seeking a weapon against Alfred Varin, not against Monsieur Andermatt. Help him."

"How?"

"Has your husband that document which completes Louis Lacombe's plans and enables them to be employed?"

"Yes."

"Tell Salvator so. If need be, try to procure the document for him. In short, enter into correspondence with him. What are you risking?"

The advice was daring, at first sight even dangerous, but Madame Andermatt had very little choice. Besides, as Daspry said, what was she risking? If the unknown individual was an enemy, this step rendered the situation no worse than before. If he was a stranger pursuing some private aim, he must attach but a secondary importance to those letters.

In any case, it was an idea; and Madame Andermatt, in her mental confusion, was only too pleased to fall in with it. She thanked us effusively and promised to keep us informed.

Two days later, she sent us a line which she had received in reply :

"The letters were not there. But set your mind at rest: I shall have them. I am attending to everything.

S."

I took up the note. It was in the same handwriting as the communication which I had found in my bedside-book on the evening of the twenty-second of June.

So Daspry was right: "Salvator" was the great wire-puller in this affair.

We were beginning, in fact, to discern a few gleams amid the surrounding darkness and certain points became illumined with an unexpected light. But others remained obscure, such as the discovery of the two sevens of hearts. I, on my side, always harked back to this, being more puzzled, perhaps, than I need have been by those two cards whose seven pierced pips had struck my eyes in such perturbing circumstances. What part did they play in the drama? What importance were we to attribute to them? What conclusion were we to draw from the fact that the submarine built in accordance with Louis Lacombe's plans bore the name of the Seven of Hearts?

As for Daspry, he paid little attention to the two cards, but devoted himself entirely to the study of another problem, the solution of which struck him as more urgent: he hunted indefatigably for the famous hiding-place.

"Who knows," he said, "but that I shall succeed in finding the letters which Salvator failed to find . . . through inadvertence, perhaps? It seems hardly credible that the Varins should have removed from a place which they considered inaccessible the weapon of which they knew the inestimable value."

And he went on hunting. Soon, the big room had no secret left for him and he extended his investigations to all the other rooms in the house, searched the inside and the outside, examined the stones and bricks of the walls, lifted up the slates of the roof.

One day, he arrived with a pick-axe and a spade, gave me the spade, kept the pick-axe, and, pointing to the waste-ground, said:

"Come along."

I followed him without enthusiasm. He divided the ground into a number of sections, which he inspected in sequence, until, in one corner, at the angle formed by the walls of two adjoining properties, his attention was attracted by a heap of stones and rubble, overgrown with brambles and grass. He attacked it forthwith.

I had to help him. For an hour we laboured to no purpose in the glaring sun. But, when, after removing the stones, we came to the ground itself and opened it, Daspry's pick-axe laid bare a number of bones, the remains of a skeleton with shreds of clothing still clinging to it.

And, suddenly, I felt myself turn pale. I saw, stuck into the earth, a small iron plate, cut in a rectangular shape and seeming to bear some red marks. I stooped. It was as I thought: the iron plate was of the size of a playing-card and the marks, the colour of red lead corroded in places, were seven in number, arranged like the pips of a seven of hearts and pierced with a hole at each of the seven points.

"Listen to me, Daspry," I said. "I've had enough of all this business. It's very pleasant for you, if it interests you. But I shall leave you to enjoy by yourself."

Was it the excitement? Was it the fatigue of a piece of work carried out in the heat of too fierce a sun? The fact remains that I staggered as I went and that I had to take to my bed, where I remained for forty-eight hours, in a burning fever and obsessed by skeletons that danced around me and threw their blood-red hearts at one another's heads.

Daspry was faithful to me. Every day he gave me three or four hours of his time, though it is true that he spent them in ferreting, tapping and poking round the big room.

"The letters are in there, in that room," he came and told me, at intervals. "They're in there, I'll stake my life on it."

"Leave me alone, for goodness' sake," I replied, with my hair standing on end.

On the morning of the third day I got up, feeling very weak still, but cured. A substantial lunch did me good. But an express letter which I received at about five o'clock contributed even more to complete my recovery and stimulated my curiosity anew, in spite of everything.

The letter contained these words:

"SIR,

"The play of which the first act was performed on the night of the 22nd June is approaching its conclusion. As the force of things requires that I should bring the two principal characters face to face and that this confrontation should take place at your house, I shall be infinitely obliged if you will let me have the use of your house this evening. It would be a good thing if your servant could be sent out from nine to eleven and perhaps it would be as well if you yourself would be so extremely kind as to leave the field free to the adversaries. You were able to see for yourself, on the 22nd June, that I made a point of respecting all your belongings. I for my part, would consider that I was insulting you if I were for a moment to doubt your absolute discretion with regard to “Yours sincerely,

“SALVATOR.”

I was delighted with the tone of courteous irony in which this letter was couched and with the pretty wit of the request which it conveyed. It was so charmingly free and unconstrained, and my correspondent seemed so sure of my compliance! I would not for the world have disappointed him or replied to his confidence with ingratitude.

My servant, to whom I gave a ticket for the theatre, was out at eight o'clock, when Daspry arrived. I showed him the letter. He said :

“Well?”

“Well, I shall leave the garden-gate unlocked, so that he can come in.”

“And are you going out?”

“Not if I know it!”

“But he asks you to . . .”

“He asks me to be discreet. I shall be discreet. But I am mad with curiosity to see what happens.”

Daspry laughed :

“By Jove, you're right, and I shall stay too! Something tells me that we shan't be bored . . .”

He was interrupted by a ring at the bell.

“Are they there already?” he muttered. “Twenty minutes before their time? Impossible!”

I went to the hall and pulled the cord that opened the garden-gate. A woman's figure came down the path : it was Madame Andermatt.

She seemed greatly upset, and her voice caught as she stammered out :

"My husband . . . he's on his way. . . . He has an appointment here. . . . They're going to give him the letters . . ."

"How do you know?" I asked.

"By accident. My husband had a message during dinner."

"An express letter?"

"No, a telephone message. The servant handed it to me by mistake. My husband took it from me at once, but it was too late . . . I had read it."

"What did it say?"

"Something like this: 'Be at the Boulevard Maillot at nine this evening with the documents relating to the business. In exchange, the letters.' When dinner was over, I went up to my room and came on here."

"Unknown to Monsieur Andermatt?"

"Yes."

Daspry looked at me:

"What do you think of it?"

"I think what you think, that Monsieur Andermatt is one of the adversaries summoned."

"By whom? And for what purpose?"

"That is exactly what we shall see."

I took them to the big room. We found that there was just space for the three of us under the chimney-mantel and that we could hide behind the velvet curtain. We took up our positions there. Madame Andermatt sat between Daspry and myself. We had a view of the whole room through the slits in the hangings.

The clock struck nine. A few minutes later, the garden-gate grated on its hinges.

I confess that I felt a certain pang and that a new fever seized upon me. I was on the point of discovering the key to the mystery! The bewildering adventure whose successive phases had been unfolding themselves before me for weeks ~~was~~ at last about to adopt its real meaning; and the battle was to be fought before my eyes.

Daspry took Madame Andermatt's hand and whispered:

"Be sure not to make a movement. Whatever you see or hear, remain impassive."

A man entered the room. And I at once recognised Alfred Varin, by his strong resemblance to his brother Étienne. He had the same heavy gait, the same dark, bearded face.

He came in with the anxious air of a man who is accustomed to fear ambushes around him, who suspects them and avoids them. He cast a rapid glance all round the room and I felt that that chimney hidden by a velvet curtain annoyed him. He took three steps in our direction. But an idea, doubtless more urgent than the first, diverted him from his intention; for, turning towards the wall, he stopped before the old mosaic emperor, with the flowing beard and the gleaming sword, and examined the figure at length, mounting a chair, following the outline of the shoulders and the face with his finger and touching certain portions as he did so.

But, suddenly, he jumped from his chair and moved away from the wall. A sound of footsteps approached. M. Andermatt appeared upon the threshold.

The banker uttered an exclamation of surprise :

"You! You! Was it you that sent for me?"

"I? Not at all!" protested Varin, in a grating voice that reminded me of his brother's. "I came because of your letter."

"My letter?"

"A letter signed by you, in which you offer me . . ."

"I never wrote to you."

"You never wrote to me!"

Instinctively, Varin took up a position of defence, not against the banker, but against the unknown foe who had drawn him into this snare. For the second time, his eyes turned in our direction and, with a quick step, he moved towards the door.

M. Andermatt blocked his way :

"What are you doing, Varin?"

"There's more in this than meets the eye. I don't like it. I'm going. Good-night."

"One moment!"

"Come, Monsieur Andermatt, don't insist; you and I have nothing to say to each other."

"We have a great deal to say to each other; and the opportunity is too good . . ."

"Let me pass."

"No, no, no, you shall not pass."

Varin fell back, cowed by the banker's resolute attitude, and mumbled :

"Be quick, then; say what you have to say and be done with it!"

One thing astonished me, and I had no doubt that my two companions underwent the same feeling of disappointment. Why was "Salvator" not there? Did it not form part of his plan to interfere? Did the mere bringing together of the banker and Varin appear to him enough? I felt curiously ill at ease. By the fact of "Salvator's" absence, this duel, desired and contrived by himself, was assuming the tragic turn of an event created and controlled by the strict order of destiny; and the force that ~~was~~ now hurling these two men against each other was the more impressive inasmuch as it dwelt outside themselves.

After a moment, M. Andermatt went up to Varin, and, standing right in front of him and looking him straight in the eyes, said :

"Now that years have passed and you have nothing more to fear, answer me frankly, Varin. What have you done with Louis Lacombe?"

"There's a question! As if I could know where he is!"

"You do know! You do know! You and your brother followed his every footstep, you almost lived with him, in this very house where ~~we~~ are standing. You knew all about his work, all about his schemes. And on that last evening, Varin, when I saw Louis Lacombe to my front door, I caught sight of two figures lurking in the shadow. That I am prepared to swear to."

"Well; and when you have sworn to it? . . ."

"It was your brother and you, Varin."

"Prove it."

"Why, the best proof is that, two days later, you yourself showed me the papers and plans which you had found in Lacombe's portfolio, and offered to sell them to me. How did those papers come into your possession?"

"I told you, Monsieur Andermatt, that we found them on Louis Lacombe's table the next morning, after he had disappeared."

"That's a lie."

"Prove it."

"The police could have proved it."

"Why didn't you go to the police?"

"Why? Ah, why . . . ?"

He was silent, with a gloomy face. And the other resumed:

"You see, Monsieur Andermatt, if you had had the least certainty, you would not have allowed our little threat to prevent you . . ."

"What threat? Those letters? Do you imagine that I ever believed for a single moment . . . ?"

"If you did not believe in those letters, why did you offer me untold money to give them up? And why, since then, did you have my brother and me hunted like wild beasts?"

"To recover the plans which I wanted."

"Nonsense! You wanted the letters! Once in possession of the letters, you would have informed against us. You didn't catch me parting with them!" A sudden fit of laughter interrupted him. "But enough of this. It's no use saying the same thing over and over again; we should get no further. So we'll drop the subject."

"We will do nothing of the kind," said the banker, "and, now that you have spoken of the letters, you shall not go from this place without handing them over to me."

"I shall go!"

"No, no, no!"

"Listen to me, Monsieur Andermatt: I advise you . . ."

"You shall not go."

"We shall see," said Varin, in so furious a tone that Madame Andermatt stifled a faint cry.

He must have heard it, for he tried to pass by force. M. Andermatt pushed him back violently. Then I saw him slip his hand into his jacket-pocket.

"For the last time!"

"The letters first!"

Varin drew a revolver and, pointing it at M. Andermatt :

"Yes or no?"

The banker stooped quickly.

A shot rang out. The weapon fell to the ground.

I was dumbfounded. The shot had been fired from my side. And it was Daspry who, with a pistol-bullet, had dashed the revolver out of Alfred Varin's hand.

Standing suddenly between the two adversaries, facing Varin, he sneered :

"You're lucky, my friend, you're jolly lucky! I aimed at your hand and hit your revolver."

Both men stared at him in motionless confusion. He said to the banker :

"Forgive me, sir, for interfering in what does not concern me. But really you play your cards very badly. Let me hold them for you."

Turning to the other :

"Now then, my lad. And play the game, please. Hearts are trumps, and I lead the seven!"

And he dashed the iron plate with the seven red pips within three inches of Varin's nose.

Never did I see a man so taken aback. Livid, his eyes starting from his head, his features distorted with agony, Varin seemed hypnotised by the sight before him :

"Who are you?" he stammered.

"I have already told you : a gentleman who meddles with what does not concern him . . . but who meddles with it to the bitter end."

"What do you want?"

"All that you've brought."

"I've brought nothing."

"Yes, you have, or you wouldn't have come. You received a note this morning telling you to be here at nine o'clock and to bring all the papers you had. Well, you're here. Where are the papers?"

There was an air of authority in Daspry's voice and attitude that nonplussed me, a peremptory demeanour that was quite new to me in this rather easy-going and mild-mannered man. Varin, now entirely subdued, pointed to one of his pockets :

"The papers are there."

"Are they all there?"

"Yes."

"All that you found in Louis Lacombe's portfolio and sold to Major von Lieben?"

"Yes."

"Are they the copies or the originals?"

"The originals."

"What do you want for them?"

"A hundred thousand francs."

Daspry burst out :

"You're mad! The major only gave you twenty thousand. Twenty thousand francs flung away, now that the trials have failed."

"They did not know how to use the plans."

"The plans are not complete."

"Then why do you ask for them?"

"I want them. I'll give you five thousand francs. Not a sou more."

"Ten thousand. Not a sou less."

"Agreed."

Daspry turned to M. Andermatt :

"Be good enough, sir, to sign a cheque."

"But . . . I haven't my . . ."

"Your cheque-book? Here it is."

Astounded, M. Andermatt fingered the cheque-book which Daspry handed him :

"It's my cheque-book. . . . But how . . ."

"My dear sir, please don't waste words: you have only to sign it."

The banker took out his stylograph and filled in and signed the cheque. Varin held out his hand.

"Paws off!" said Daspry. "We've not done yet."

And, to the banker:

"There was also the question of some letters which you claim."

"Yes, a bundle of letters."

"Where are they, Varin?"

"I haven't them."

"Where are they, Varin?"

"I don't know. My brother took charge of them."

"They are hidden here, in this room."

"In that case, you know where they are."

"How should I know?"

"Considering it was you that went to the hiding-place! You seem to be as well-informed as . . . Salvator!"

"The letters are not in the hiding-place."

"They are."

"Open it."

A look of distrust passed over Varin's face. Were Daspry and "Salvator" really one, as everything led him to presume? If so, he risked nothing by revealing a hiding-place that was already known. If not, there was no point in . . .

"Open it," repeated Daspry.

"I haven't a seven of hearts."

"Yes, here's one," said Daspry, holding out the iron plate.

Varin fell back in terror:

"No . . . no . . . I will not . . ."

"Never mind . . ."

Daspry went up to the old emperor with the flowing beard, climbed a chair and applied the seven of hearts to the bottom of the sword, against the hilt, so that the edges of the plate exactly covered the two edges of the blade. Then, with the point of an awl, which he pushed successively through each of the seven holes in the ends of the seven pips, he pressed upon seven of the tiny stones composing the mosaic. When the seventh stone was driven in, a catch was released and the whole of the emperor's bust turned on a pivot, revealing a wide aperture arranged as a safe, iron-cased and fitted with two shelves of bright steel.

"You see, Varin, the safe is empty."

"Just so. . . . Then my brother must have removed the letters."

Daspry came back to the man and said :

"Don't try to get the better of me. There is another hiding-place. Where is it?"

"There isn't one."

"Is it money you want? How much?"

"Ten thousand francs."

"Monsieur Andermatt, are those letters worth ten thousand francs to you?"

"Yes," said the banker, in a firm voice.

Varin shut the safe, took the seven of hearts, not without a visible repugnance, and applied it to the blade, at exactly the same place, against the hilt. He drove the awl successively through the end of the seven pips. There was a second release of a catch, but, this time, an unexpected thing occurred: only part of the safe turned round, disclosing a smaller safe, contrived in the thickness of the door that closed the large one.

The bundle of letters was there, tied up with tape and sealed. Varin gave it to Daspry, who asked :

"Is the cheque ready, Monsieur Andermatt?"

"Yes."

"And have you also the last document which Louis Lacombe left with you, completing the plans of the submarine?"

"Yes."

The exchange was made. Daspry pocketed the document and the cheque and offered the packet to M. Andermatt :

"Here is what you wanted, sir."

The banker hesitated a moment, as though afraid to touch those cursed pages which he had been so eager to find. Then he took them, with a nervous movement.

I heard a groan by my side. I caught hold of Madame Andermatt's hand: it was icy cold.

And Daspry said to the banker:

"I think, sir, that our conversation is ended. Oh, no thanks, I beg of you. It was a mere accident that enabled me to serve you."

M. Andermatt withdrew, taking with him his wife's letters to Louis Lacombe.

"Splendid!" cried Daspry, with an air of delight. "Everything is arranged for the best. You and I have only to settle our business, my lad. Have you the papers?"

"They are all here."

Daspry looked through them, examined them closely and stuffed them into his pocket:

"Quite right; you have kept your word."

"But . . ."

"But what?"

"The two cheques . . . ? The money . . . ?"

"Well, you're a cool hand, you are! What! You dare put in a claim . . . !"

"I claim what is owing to me."

"Do you mean to say that anything is owing to you for papers which you stole?"

But the man seemed beside himself. He shook with rage; his eyes were shot with blood:

"Give me my money . . . the twenty thousand francs," he stuttered.

"Out of the question . . . I appropriate it."

"My money!"

"Come, be reasonable . . . and drop that dagger, will you?"

He caught him by the arm so roughly that the other roared with pain; and he added:

"Go away, my lad; the air will do you good. Would you like me to see you off? We will go by the waste-ground and I will show you a heap of stones and brambles, under which . . ."

"It's not true! It's not true!"

"Yes, it is true. This little iron plate with the seven pips came from there. Louis Lacombe used always to carry it about with him, don't you remember? You and your brother buried it with the corpse . . . and with other things which will interest the police enormously."

Varin covered his face with his shaking fists. Then he said :

"Very well. I have been done. Let's say no more about it. One word, however . . . just one word . . . I want to know . . ."

"Go on . . ."

"There was a cash-box in that safe, in the larger of the two."

"Yes."

"Was it there when you came here, on the night of the twenty-second of June?"

"Yes."

"What was inside it?"

"All that the brothers Varin had locked up in it : a very pretty collection of jewels, diamonds and pearls, picked up right and left by the aforesaid brothers."

"And did you take it?"

"By Jove! What would you have done in my place?"

"Then . . . it was after he discovered the disappearance of the cash-box that my brother shot himself?"

"Probably. The disappearance of your correspondence with Major von Lieben would hardly have been enough. But the cash-box was another matter. . . . Is that all you wanted to know?"

"One thing more : your name?"

"You say that as though you were thinking of revenge."

"Quite right! One's luck turns. You're on top to-day. To-morrow . . ."

"You may be."

"I hope so. What's your name?"

"Arsène Lupin."

"Arsène Lupin!"

The man staggered back, as though he had received a blow on the head with a club. Those two words seemed to dash all his hopes. Daspry laughed.

"Ah, so you thought that some Monsieur Durand or Dupont had managed this fine business? Come, come, it must have needed an Arsène Lupin at least. And, now that you know all you wanted to, old chap, go and prepare your revenge. You will find Arsène Lupin waiting for you."

And, without another word, he pushed him out at the door.

"Daspry, Daspry!" I cried, still, in spite of myself, calling him by the name by which I had known him.

I pulled back the velvet curtain.

He ran up:

"What is it? What's the matter?"

"Madame Andermatt is fainting."

He hastened to her side, made her sniff at a bottle of salts and, while he was bringing her round, asked:

"Well, but what happened?"

"The letters," I said. "The letters which you gave her husband."

He struck his forehead:

"What! She believed . . . But, after all, why shouldn't she believe? . . . Fool that I am!"

Madame Andermatt, when she had recovered consciousness, listened to him greedily. He drew from his pocket a little bundle similar in every respect to that which M. Andermatt had taken away:

"Here are your letters, madame, the real ones."

"But . . . the others?"

"The others are like these, but were copied out by me, last night, and carefully altered. Your husband will be all the better pleased when he reads them, as he has no idea that they are not the originals, since everything took place before his eyes."

"But the writing . . ."

"There is no writing that can't be imitated."

She thanked him, in the same terms of gratitude which she would have addressed to a man of her own station, and it was clear to me that she could not have heard the last sentences exchanged between Varin and Arsène Lupin.

As for myself, I looked at him with a certain perplexity, not quite knowing what to say to this old friend who was revealing himself to me in so unexpected a light. Lupin! It was Lupin! My dear old club-acquaintance was none other than Arsène Lupin! I could not get over it. But he, very much at his ease, said:

"You can say good-bye to Jean Daspry."

"Really?"

"Yes, Jean Daspry is going abroad. I am sending him to Morocco, where he will probably come to an end quite worthy of himself. In fact, he has made up his mind."

"But Arsène Lupin remains . . .?"

"I should think so! Arsène Lupin is only at the beginning of his career and he fully means to . . ."

An impulse of irresistible curiosity attracted me to him and, leading him to some distance from Madame Andermatt, I asked:

"So you ended by discovering the second hiding-place containing the letters?"

"It took me long enough, though! It was not until yesterday afternoon, while you were still in bed. And yet goodness knows how easy it was! But the simplest things always occur to one last." And, showing me the seven of hearts, "I had guessed that, in order to open the large safe, I had to press this card against the sword of the old boy in mosaic. . . ."

"How did you guess that?"

"Easily. From private information, I knew, when I came here, on the evening of the twenty-second of June . . ."

"After leaving me . . ."

"Yes; and after selecting my conversation so as to throw you into such a state of mind that a nervous and impressionable man like yourself was bound to let me act as I pleased, without leaving his bed."

"The reasoning was sound."

"Well, I knew, when I came here, that there was a cash-box hidden in a safe with a secret lock, to which the seven of hearts formed the key. It was only a question of applying the seven of hearts to a place that was obviously intended for it. An hour's examination was enough for me."

"An hour!"

"Look at the old boy in mosaic."

"The emperor?"

"That old emperor is the exact image of Charlemagne, who figures as the king of hearts in every French pack."

"You're quite right . . . But why should the seven of hearts open sometimes the large and sometimes the small one? And why did you open only the large safe at first?"

"Why? Because I persisted in always applying my seven of hearts in the same way. Yesterday only, I perceived that, by turning it round, that is to say by putting the seventh pip, the middle one, with its point up instead of down, the position of the seven pips was altered."

"Of course!"

"It's very easy to say 'of course,' but I ought to have thought of it."

"Another thing: you knew nothing about the story of the letters until Madame Andermatt . . ."

"Spoke of it before me? Just so. I found nothing in the safe, besides the cash-box, except the correspondence of the two brothers, which put me on the scent of their treason."

"So, when all is said, it was chance that made you first reconstruct the story of the two brothers and next search for the plans and documents of the submarine?"

"Pure chance."

"But what was your object in making those researches? . . ."

Daspry interrupted me, with a laugh:

"Bless my soul, how the thing interests you!"

"It interests me madly."

"Well, presently, when I have seen Madame Andermatt home and sent a messenger to the Echo de France with a few lines which I want to write, I will come back and we will go into details.”

He sat down and wrote one of those monumental little paragraphs that delight his whimsical imagination. Who does not remember the noise which this particular one made throughout the world?

“Arsène Lupin has solved the problem which was set the other day by ‘Salvator’. He has obtained possession of all the original plans and documents of Louis Lacombe, the engineer, and has forwarded them to the Minister of Marine. Moreover, Arsène Lupin is opening a subscription to present the State with the first submarine constructed after these plans. And he himself has headed the list by subscribing twenty thousand francs.”

“The twenty thousand francs of the Andermatt cheques?” I said, when he had given me the paper to read.

“Exactly. It was only fair that Varin should at least partly redeem his treason.”

■ * * ■

And that was how I came to know Arsène Lupin. That was how I learnt that Jean Daspry, my acquaintance at the club and in society, was none other than Arsène Lupin, the gentleman-burglar. That was how I formed bonds of a very pleasant friendship with the great man, and how, thanks to the confidence with which he deigns to honour me, I gradually came to be his most humble, devoted, and grateful biographer.

THE ARREST OF ARSÈNE LUPIN

THE ARREST OF ARSÈNE LUPIN

THE strangest of journeys! And yet it had begun so well! I, for my part, had never made a voyage that started under better auspices. The Provence is a swift and comfortable transatlantic liner, commanded by the most genial of men. The company on board was very select. Acquaintances were formed, amusements organised. We had the delightful feeling of being separated from the rest of the world, reduced to our own devices, as though upon an unknown island, and obliged, therefore, to make friends with one another. And we grew more and more intimate. . . .

Have you never reflected on the element of originality and surprise contained in this grouping of a number of people who, but a day earlier, had never seen one another and who, for the next few days, are destined to live together in the closest contact, between the infinite sky and the boundless sea, defying the fury of the ocean, the alarming onslaught of the waves, the malice of the winds, and the distressing calmness of the slumbering waters?

Life itself, in fact, with its storms and its greatnesses, its monotony and its variety, becomes a sort of tragic epitome; and that, perhaps, is why we enjoy with a fevered haste and an intensified delight this short voyage, of which we see the end at the very moment when we embark upon it.

But, of late years, a thing has come to pass that adds curiously to the excitement of the crossing. The little floating island remains connected with the world from which we thought ourselves cut adrift. One link remains and is at intervals tied and at intervals untied in mid-ocean. The wireless telegraph! As who should say a summons from another world, whence we receive news in the most mysterious fashion! The imagination no longer has the resource of picturing wires along which the invisible message glides : the mystery is even more insoluble, more poetic; and we must have recourse to the wings of the wind to explain the new miracle.

And so, from the start, we felt that we were being followed, escorted, even preceded by that distant voice which, from time to time, whispered to one of us a few words from the continent which we had quitted. Two of my friends spoke to me. Ten others, twenty others sent to all of us, through space, their sad or cheery greetings.

Now, on the stormy afternoon of the second day, when we were five hundred miles from the French coast, the wireless telegraph sent us a message of the following tenor :

“Arsène Lupin on board your ship, first-class, fair hair, wound on right forearm, travelling alone under alias R——.”

At that exact moment, a violent thunder-clap burst in the dark sky. The electric waves were interrupted. The rest of the message failed to reach us. We knew only the initial of the name under which Arsène Lupin was concealing his identity.

Had the news been any other, I have no doubt that the secret would have been scrupulously kept by the telegraph-clerks and the captain and his officers. But there are certain events that appear to overcome the strictest discretion. Before the day was past, though no one could have told how the rumour had got about, we all knew that the famous Arsène Lupin was hidden in our midst.

Arsène Lupin in our midst! The mysterious house-breaker whose exploits had been related in all the newspapers for months! The baffling individual with whom old Ganimard, our greatest detective, had entered upon that duel to the death of which the episodes were being revealed in so picturesque a fashion! Arsène Lupin, the fastidious gentleman who confines his operations to country-houses and fashionable drawing-rooms, and who, one night, after breaking in at Baron Schormann's, had gone away empty-handed, leaving his visiting-card :

ARSÈNE LUPIN
Gentleman-Burglar

with these words added in pencil :

“Will return when your things are genuine.”

Arsène Lupin, the man with a thousand disguises, by turns chauffeur, opera-singer, bookmaker, gilded youth, young man, old man, Marseillaise bagman, Russian doctor, Spanish bull-fighter!

Picture the situation: Arsène Lupin moving about within the comparatively restricted compass of a transatlantic liner; nay, more, within the small space reserved for the first-class passengers, where one might come across him at any moment, in the saloon, the drawing-room, the smoking-room! Why, Arsène Lupin might be that gentleman over there . . . or this ~~one~~ close by . . . or my neighbour at table . . . or the passenger sharing my state-room. . . .

“And just think, this is going to last for five days!” cried Miss Nellie Underdown, on the following day. “Why, it’s awful! I do hope they’ll catch him!” And, turning to me, “Do say, Monsieur d’Andrézy, you’re such friends with the captain, haven’t you heard anything?”

I wished that I had, if only to please Nellie Underdown. She was one of those magnificent creatures that become the cynosure of all eyes wherever they may be. Their beauty is as dazzling as their fortune. A court of fervent enthusiasts follows in their train.

She had been brought up in Paris by her French mother and was now on her way to Chicago to join her father, Underdown, the American millionaire. A friend, Lady Gerland, was chaperoning her on the voyage.

I had paid her some slight attentions from the first. But, almost immediately, in the rapid intimacy of ocean travel, her charms had gained upon me and my emotions ~~now~~ exceeded those of a mere flirtation whenever her great dark eyes met mine. She, on her side, received my devotion with a certain favour. She condescended to laugh at my jokes and to be interested in my stories. A vague sympathy seemed to respond to the assiduity which I displayed.

One rival alone, perhaps, could have given me cause for anxiety: a rather good-looking fellow, well-dressed and reserved in manner, whose silent humour seemed at times to attract her more than did my somewhat "butterfly" Parisian ways.

He happened to form one of the group of admirers surrounding Miss Underdown at the moment when she spoke to me. We were on deck, comfortably installed in our chairs. The storm of the day before had cleared the sky. It was a delightful afternoon.

"I have heard nothing very definite," I replied. "But why should we not be able to conduct our own enquiry just as well as old Ganimard, Lupin's personal enemy, might do?"

"I say, you're going very fast!"

"Why? Is the problem so complicated?"

"Most complicated."

"You only say that because you forget the clues which we possess towards its solution?"

"Which clues?"

"First, Lupin is travelling under the name of Monsieur R——"

"That's rather vague."

"Secondly, he's travelling alone."

"If you consider that a sufficient detail!"

"Thirdly, he is fair."

"Well, then?"

"Then we need only consult the list of first-class passengers and proceed by elimination."

I had the list in my pocket. I took it and glanced through it:

"To begin with, I see that there are only thirteen persons whose names begin with an R."

"Only thirteen?"

"In the first class, yes. Of these thirteen R's, as you can ascertain for yourself, nine are accompanied by their wives, children or servants. That leaves four solitary passengers: the Marquis de Raverdan . . ."

"Secretary of legation," interrupted Miss Underdown. "I know him."

"Major Rawson . . ."

"That's my uncle," said someone.

"Signor Rivolta . . ."

"Here!" cried one of us, an Italian, whose face disappeared from view behind a huge black beard.

Miss Underdown had a fit of laughing:

"That gentleman is not exactly fair!"

"Then," I continued, "we are bound to conclude that the criminal is the last on the list."

"Who is that?"

"Monsieur Rozaine. Does any one know Monsieur Rozaine?"

No one answered. But Miss Underdown, turning to the silent young man, whose assiduous presence by her side vexed me, said:

"Well, Monsieur Rozaine, have you nothing to say?"

All eyes were turned upon him. He was fair-haired!

I must admit I felt a little shock pass through me. And the constrained silence that weighed down upon us showed me that the other passengers present also experienced that sort of choking feeling. The thing was absurd, however, for, after all, there was nothing in his manner to warrant our suspecting him.

"Have I nothing to say?" he replied. "Well, you see, realising what my name is and the colour of my hair and the fact that I am travelling by myself, I have already made a similar enquiry and arrived at the same conclusion. My opinion, therefore, is that I ought to be arrested."

He wore a queer expression as he uttered these words. His thin, pale lips grew thinner and paler still. His eyes were bloodshot.

There was no doubt but that he was jesting. And yet his appearance and attitude impressed us. Miss Underdown asked, innocently :

“But have you a wound?”

“That’s true,” he said. “The wound is missing.”

With a nervous movement, he pulled up his cuff and uncovered his arm. But a sudden idea struck me. My eyes met Miss Underdown’s: he had shown his left arm.

And, upon my word, I was on the point of remarking upon this, when an incident occurred to divert our attention. Lady Gerland, Miss Underdown’s friend, came running up.

She was in a state of great agitation. Her fellow-passengers crowded round her; and it was only after many efforts that she succeeded in stammering out :

“My jewels! . . . My pearls! . . . They’ve all been stolen!”

No, they had not all been stolen, as we subsequently discovered; a much more curious thing had happened: the thief had made a selection!

From the diamond star, the pendant of uncut rubies, the broken necklaces and bracelets, he had removed not the largest, but the finest, the most precious stones, those, in fact, which had the greatest value, and, at the same time, occupied the smallest space. The settings were left lying on the table. I saw them, we all saw them, stripped of their gems like flowers from which the fair, bright-coloured petals had been torn.

And, to carry out this work, he had had, in broad daylight, while Lady Gerland was taking tea, to break in the door of the state-room in a frequented passage, to discover a little jewel-case purposely hidden at the bottom of a band-box, to open it and make his choice.

We all uttered the same cry. There was but one opinion among the passengers when the theft became known: it was Arsène Lupin. And, indeed, the theft had been committed in his own complicated, mysterious, inscrutable . . . and yet logical manner, for we realised that, though it would have been difficult to conceal the cumbersome mass which the ornaments as a whole would have formed, he would have much less trouble with such small independent objects as single pearls, emeralds and sapphires.

At dinner this happened: the two seats to the right and left of Rozaine remained unoccupied. And in the evening, we knew that he had been sent for by the captain.

His arrest, of which no one entertained a doubt, caused genuine relief. We felt at last that we could breathe. We played charades in the saloon. We danced. Miss Underdown, in particular, displayed an obstreperous gaiety which made it clear to me that, though Rozaine's attentions might have pleased her at first, she no longer gave them a thought. Her charm conquered me entirely. At midnight, under the still rays of the moon, I declared myself her devoted admirer with a depth of emotion which she did not appear to resent.

But, the next day, to the general stupefaction, it became known that the charges brought against him were insufficient. Rozaine was free.

It seemed that he was the son of a wealthy Bordeaux merchant. He had produced papers which were in perfect order. Moreover, his arms showed not the slightest trace of a wound.

"Papers, indeed!" exclaimed Rozaine's enemies. "Birth-certificates! Tush! Why, Arsène Lupin can supply them by the dozen. As for the wound, it only shows that he never had a wound . . . or that he has removed its traces!"

Somebody suggested that, at the time when the theft was committed, Rozaine—this had been proved—was walking on deck. In reply to this, it was urged that, with a man of Arsène Lupin's stamp, it was not really necessary for the thief to be present at his own crime. And, lastly, apart from all other considerations, there was one point upon which the most sceptical had nothing to say: who but Rozaine was travelling alone, had fair hair and was called by a name beginning with the letter R? Who but Rozaine answered to the description in the telegram?

And, when Rozaine, a few minutes before lunch, boldly made for our group, Lady Gerland and Miss Underdown rose and walked away.

It was a question of pure fright.

An hour later, a manuscript circular was passed from hand to hand among the staff of the vessel, the crew, and the passengers of all classes. M. Louis Rozaine had promised a reward of ten thousand francs to whosoever should unmask Arsène Lupin or discover the possessor of the stolen jewels.

"And if no one helps me against the ruffian," said Rozaine to the captain, "I'll settle his business myself."

The contest between Rozaine and Arsène Lupin, or rather, in the phrase that soon became current, between Arsène Lupin himself and Arsène Lupin, was not lacking in interest.

It lasted two days. Rozaine was observed wandering to right and left, mixing with the crew, questioning and ferreting on every hand. His shadow was seen prowling about at night.

The captain, on his side, displayed the most active energy. The Provence was searched from stem to stern, in every nook and corner. Every state-room was turned out, without exception, under the very proper pretext that the stolen objects must be hidden somewhere, anywhere rather than in the thief's own cabin.

"Surely they will end by finding something?" asked Miss Underdown. "Wizard though he may be, he can't make pearls and diamonds invisible."

"Of course they will," I replied, "or else they will have to search the linings of our hats and clothes and anything that we carry about with us." And, showing her my 5 by 4 Kodak, with which I never wearied of photographing her in all manner of attitudes, I added, "Why, even in a camera no larger than this there would be room to stow away all Lady Gerland's jewels. You pretend to be taking snapshots and the thing is done."

"Still, I have heard people say that every burglar always leaves some sort of clue behind him."

"There is one who never does : Arsène Lupin."

"Why?"

"Why? Because he thinks not only of the crime which he is committing, but of all the circumstances that might tell against him."

"You were more confident at first."

"Ah, but I had not seen him at work then!"

"And so you think . . ."

"I think that we are wasting our time."

As a matter of fact, the investigations produced no result whatever, or, at least, that which was produced did not correspond with the general effort: the captain lost his watch!

He was furious, redoubled his zeal and kept an even closer eye than before on Rozaine, with whom he had several interviews. The next day, with a delightful irony, the watch was found among the second officer's collars.

All this was very wonderful and pointed clearly to the humorous handiwork of a burglar, if you like, but an artist besides. He worked at his profession for a living, but also for his amusement. He gave the impression of a dramatist who thoroughly enjoys his own plays and who stands in the wings laughing heartily at the comic dialogue and diverting situations which he himself has invented.

Yes, he was decidedly an artist in his way; and when I observed Rozaine so gloomy and stubborn, and reflected on the two-faced part which this curious individual was doubtless playing, I was unable to speak of him, without a certain feeling of admiration.

Well, on the night but one before our arrival in America, the officer of the watch heard groans on the darkest portion of the deck. He drew nearer, went up and saw a man stretched at full length, with his head wrapped in a thick, grey muffler and his hands tied together with a thin cord.

They unfastened his bonds, lifted him, and gave him a restorative.

The man was Rozaine.

Yes, it was Rozaine, who had been attacked in the course of one of his expeditions, knocked down and robbed. A visiting-card pinned to his clothes bore these words :

“Arsène Lupin accepts M. Rozaine’s ten thousand francs with thanks.”

As a matter of fact, the stolen pocket-book contained twenty thousand-franc notes.

Of course, the unfortunate man was accused of counterfeiting this attack upon his own person. But, apart from the fact that it would have been impossible for him to bind himself in this way, it was proved that the writing on the card differed absolutely from Rozaine’s handwriting, whereas it was exactly like that of Arsène Lupin, as reproduced in an old newspaper which had been found on board.

So Rozaine was not Arsène Lupin ! Rozaine was Rozaine, the son of a Bordeaux merchant ! and Arsène Lupin’s presence had been asserted once again and by means of this formidable act !

Sheer terror ensued. The passengers no longer dared stay alone in their cabins or wander unaccompanied to the remoter parts of the ship. Those who felt sure of one another kept prudently together. And even here an instinctive mistrust divided those who knew one another best. The danger no longer threatened from a solitary individual, kept under observation and therefore less dangerous. Arsène Lupin now seemed to be . . . to be everybody. Our over-excited imaginations ascribed to him the possession of a miraculous and boundless power. We supposed him capable of assuming the most unexpected disguises, of being by turns the most respectable Major Rawson, or the most noble Marquis de Raverdan, or even—for we no longer stopped at the accusing initial—this or that person known to all of us and travelling with a wife, children, and servants.

The wireless telegrams brought us no news. At least, the captain did not communicate them to us ; and this silence was not calculated to reassure us.

It was small wonder, therefore, that the last day appeared interminable. The passengers lived in the anxious expectation of a tragedy. This time, it would not be a theft ; it would not be a mere assault; it would be crime, murder. No one ~~was~~ willing to admit that Arsène Lupin would rest content with those two insignificant acts of larceny. He was absolute master of the ship; he had reduced the officers to impotence; he had but to wreak his will upon us. He could do as he pleased; he held our lives and property in his hands.

These were delightful hours to me, I confess, for they won for me the confidence of Nellie Underdown. Naturally timid and impressed by all these events, she spontaneously sought at my side the protection which I was happy to offer her.

In my heart I blessed Arsène Lupin. Was it not he who had brought us together? Was it not to him that I owed the right to abandon myself to my fondest dreams? Dreams of love and dreams more practical: why not confess it? The d'Andrézys are of good Poitevin stock, but the gilt of their blazon is a little worn; and it did not seem to me unworthy of a man of family to think of restoring the lost lustre of his name.

Nor, I was convinced did these dreams offend Nellie. Her smiling eyes gave me leave to indulge them. Her soft voice bade me hope.

And we remained side by side until the last moment, with our elbows resting on the bulwark rail, while the outline of the American coast grew more and more distinct.

The search had been abandoned. All seemed expectation. From the first-class saloon to the steerage, with its swarm of emigrants, every one was waiting for the supreme moment when the insoluble riddle would be explained. Who was Arsène Lupin? Under what name, under what disguise was the famous Arsène Lupin lurking?

The supreme moment came. If I live to be a hundred, never shall I forget its smallest detail.

"How pale you look, Nellie!" I said, as she leant, almost fainting, upon my arm.

"And you, too. Oh, how you have changed!" she replied.

"Think what an exciting minute this is, and how happy

I am to pass it at your side. I wonder, Nellie, if your memory will sometimes linger . . .”

All breathless and fevered, she was not listening. The gang-plank was lowered. But, before we were allowed to cross it, men came on board: custom-house officers, men in uniform, postmen.

Nellie murmured:

“I shouldn’t be surprised even if we heard that Arsène Lupin had escaped during the passage!”

“He may have preferred death to dishonour and plunged into the Atlantic rather than submit to arrest!”

“Don’t jest about it,” said she, in a tone of vexation.

Suddenly, I gave a start, and, in answer to her question, I replied:

“Do you see that little old man standing by the gang-plank?”

“The one in a green frock-coat with an umbrella?”

“That’s Ganimard.”

“Ganimard?”

“Yes, the famous detective who swore that he would arrest Arsène Lupin with his own hand. Ah, now I understand why we received no news from this side of the ocean. Ganimard was here; and he does not care to have any one interfering in his affairs.”

“So Arsène Lupin is quite sure to be caught?”

“Who can tell? Ganimard has never seen him, I believe, except made-up and disguised. Unless he knows the name under which he is travelling . . .”

“Oh,” she said, with a woman’s cruel curiosity, “I should love to see the arrest!”

“Have patience,” I replied. “No doubt Arsène Lupin has already observed his enemy’s presence. He will prefer to leave among the last, when the old man’s eyes are tired.”

The passengers began to cross the gang-plank. Leaning on his umbrella with an indifferent air, Ganimard seemed to pay no attention to the throng that crowded past between the two handrails. I noticed that one of the ship’s officers, standing behind him, whispered in his ear from time to time.

The Marquis de Raverdan, Major Rawson, Rivolta, the Italian, went past and others and many more. Then I saw Rozaine approaching.

Poor Rozaine! He did not seem to have recovered from his misadventures!

"It may be he, all the same," said Nellie. "What do you think?"

"I think it would be very interesting to have Ganimard and Rozaine in one photograph. Would you take the camera? My hands are so full."

I gave it to her, but too late for her to use it. Rozaine crossed. The officer bent over to Ganimard's ear; Ganimard gave a shrug of the shoulders; and Rozaine passed on.

But then who, in heaven's name, was Arsène Lupin?

"Yes," she said aloud, "who is it?"

There were only a score of people left. Nellie looked at them, one after the other, with the bewildered dread that "he" was not one of the twenty.

I said to her :

"We can't wait any longer."

She moved on. I followed her. But we had not taken ten steps when Ganimard barred our passage.

"What does this mean?" I exclaimed.

"One moment, sir. What's your hurry?"

"I am escorting this young lady."

"One moment," he repeated, in a more imperious tone.

He stared hard at me and then, looking me straight in the eyes, said :

"Arsène Lupin, I believe?"

I gave a laugh :

"No, Bernard d'Andrézy, simply."

"Bernard d'Andrézy died in Macedonia three years ago."

"If Bernard d'Andrézy were dead, I could not be here. And it's not so. Here are my papers."

"They are his papers. And I shall be pleased to tell you how you became possessed of them."

"But you are mad! Arsène Lupin took his passage under a name beginning with R."

"Yes, another of your tricks, a false scent upon which you put the people on the other side. Oh, you have no lack of brains, my lad! But, this time, your luck has turned. Come, Lupin, show that you're a good loser."

I hesitated for a second. He struck me a smart blow on the right forearm. I gave a cry of pain. He had hit the unhealed wound mentioned in the telegram.

There was nothing for it but to submit. I turned to Miss Underdown. She was listening, with a white face, staggering where she stood.

Her glance met mine and then fell upon the Kodak which I had handed her. She made a sudden movement and I received the impression, the certainty that she had understood. Yes, it was there, between the narrow boards covered with black morocco, inside the little camera which I had taken the precaution to place in her hands before Ganimard arrested me, it was there that Rozaine's twenty thousand francs and Lady Gerland's pearls and diamonds lay concealed.

Now I swear that, at this solemn moment, with Ganimard and two of his minions around me, everything was indifferent to me; my arrest, the hostility of my fellow-men, everything, save only this: the resolve which Nellie Underdown would take in regard to the object I had given into her charge.

Whether they had this material and decisive evidence against, what cared I? The only question that obsessed my mind was, would Nelly furnish it or not?

Would she betray me? Would she ruin me? Would she act as an irreconcilable foe, or as a woman who remembers and whose contempt is softened by a touch of indulgence, a shade of sympathy?

She passed before me; I bowed very low, without a word. Mingling with the other passengers, she moved towards the gangway, carrying my Kodak in her hand.

"Of course," I thought, "she will not dare to, in public. She will hand it over presently, in an hour."

But, on reaching the middle of the plank, with a pretended movement of awkwardness, she dropped the Kodak in the water, between the landing-stage and the ship's side.

Then I watched her walk away.

Her charming figure was lost in the crowd, came into view again and disappeared. It was over, over for good and all.

For a moment, I stood rooted to the deck, sad and, at the same time, pervaded with a sweet and tender emotion. Then, to Ganimard's great astonishment, I sighed:

"Pity, after all, that I'm a rogue!"

It was in these words that Arsène Lupin, one winter evening, told me the story of his arrest. Chance and the series of incidents which I have already described had established between us bonds of . . . shall I say friendship? Yes, I venture to think that Arsène Lupin honours me with a certain friendship; and it is owing to this friendship that he occasionally drops in upon me, unexpectedly, bringing into the silence of my study his youthful gaiety, the radiance of his eager life, his high spirits, the spirits of a man for whom fate has little but smiles and favours in store.

His likeness? How can I trace it? I have seen Arsène Lupin a score of times; and each time a different being has stood before me . . . or rather the same being under twenty distorted images reflected by as many mirrors, each image having its special eyes, its particular facial outline, its own gestures, profile and character.

"I myself," he once said to me, "have forgotten what I am really like. I no longer recognise myself in a glass."

A paradoxical whim of the imagination, no doubt, and yet true enough as regards those who come into contact with him and who are unaware of his infinite resources, his patience, his unparalleled skill in make-up and his prodigious faculty for changing even the proportions of his face and altering the relations of his features one to the other.

“Why,” he asked, “should I have a definite, fixed appearance? Why not avoid the dangers attendant upon a personality that is always the same? My actions constitute my identity sufficiently.”

And he added, with a touch of pride :

“It is all the better if people are never able to say with certainty, ‘There goes Arsène Lupin.’ The great thing is that they should say, without fear of being mistaken, ‘That action was performed by Arsène Lupin.’”

ARSENE LUPIN IN PRISON

ARSÈNE LUPIN IN PRISON

EVERY tripper by the banks of the Seine must have noticed, between the ruins of Jumièges and those of Saint-Wandrille, the curious little feudal castle of the Malaquis, proudly seated on its rock in mid-stream. A bridge connects it with the road. The base of its turrets seems to make one with the granite that supports it, a huge block detached from a mountain-top and flying where it stands by some formidable convulsion of nature. All around, the calm water of the broad river ripples among the reeds, while wagtails perch timidly on the top of the moist pebbles.

The history of the Malaquis is as rough as its name, as harsh as its outlines, and consists of endless fights, sieges, assaults, sacks, and massacres. Stories are told in the Caux country, late at night, with a shiver, of the crimes committed there. Mysterious legends are conjured up. There is talk of a famous underground passage that led to the Abbey of Jumièges and to the manor-house of Agnès Sorel, the favourite of Charles VII.

This erstwhile haunt of heroes and robbers is now occupied by Baron Nathan Cahorn, or Baron Satan as he used to be called on the Bourse, where he made his fortune a little too suddenly. The ruined owners of the Malaquis were compelled to sell the abode of their ancestors to him for a song. Here he installed his wonderful collections of pictures and furniture, of pottery and carvings. He lives here alone, with three old servants. No one ever enters the doors. No one has ever beheld, in the setting of those ancient halls, his three Rubens, his two Watteaus, his pulpit carved by Jean Goujon and all the other marvels snatched by force of money from before the eyes of the wealthiest frequenters of the public sale-rooms.

Baron Satan leads a life of fear. He is afraid not for himself, but for the treasures which he has accumulated with so tenacious a passion and with the perspicacity of a collector whom not the most cunning of dealers can boast of having ever taken in. He loves his curiosities with all the greed of a miser, with all the jealousy of a lover.

Daily, at sunset, the four iron-barred doors that command both ends of the bridge and the entrance to the principal court are locked and bolted. At the least touch, electric bells would ring through the surrounding silence. There is nothing to be feared on the side of the Seine, where the rock rises sheer from the water.

One Friday in September, the postman appeared as usual at the bridge-head. And, in accordance with his daily rule, the baron himself opened the heavy door.

He examined the man as closely as if he had not for years known that good jolly face and those crafty peasant eyes. And the man said, with a laugh :

"It's me all right, monsieur le baron. It's not another chap in my cap and blouse!"

"One never knows!" muttered Cahorn.

The postman handed him a bundle of newspapers. Then he added :

"And now, monsieur le baron, I have something special for you."

"Something special? What do you mean?"

"A letter . . . and a registered letter at that!"

Living cut off from everybody, with no friends nor any one that took an interest in him, the baron never received letters; and this suddenly struck him as an ill-omened event which gave him good cause for nervousness. Who was the mysterious correspondent that came to worry him in his retreat?

"I shall want your signature, monsieur le baron."

He signed the receipt, cursing as he did so. Then he took the letter, waited until the postman had disappeared round the turn of the road and, after taking a few steps to and fro, leaned against the parapet of the bridge and opened the envelope. It contained a sheet of ruled paper, headed, in writing :

"Prison de la Santé, Paris."

He looked at the signature :

"ARSÈNE LUPIN."

Utterly dumbfounded, he read :

"MONSIEUR LE BARON,

"In the gallery that connects your two drawing-rooms there is a picture by Philippe de Champaigne, an excellent piece of work, which I admire greatly. I also like your Rubens pictures and the smaller of your two Watteaus. In the drawing-room on the right, I note the Louis XIII credence-table, the Beauvais tapestries, the Empire stand, signed by Jacob, and the Renaissance chest. In the room on the left, the whole of the case of trinkets and miniatures.

"This time, I will be satisfied with these objects, which, I think can be easily turned into cash. I will therefore ask you to have them properly packed and to send them to my name, carriage paid, to the Gare de Batignolles, on or before this day week, failing which I will myself see to their removal on the night of Wednesday the 27th instant. In the later case, as is only fair, I shall not be content with the above-mentioned objects.

"Pray excuse the trouble which I am giving you, and believe me to be "Yours very truly,

"ARSÈNE LUPIN.

"P.S.—Be sure not to send me the larger of the two Watteaus. Although you paid thirty thousand francs for it at the sale-rooms, it is only a copy, the original having been burnt under the Directory, by Barras, in one of his orgies. See Garat's unpublished Memoirs.

"I do not care either to have the Louis XV chatelaine, the authenticity of which appears to me exceedingly doubtful."

This letter thoroughly upset Baron Cahorn. It would have alarmed him considerably had it been signed by any other hand. But signed by Arsène Lupin ! . . .

He was a regular reader of the newspapers, knew of everything that went on in the way of theft and crime and had heard all about the exploits of the infernal housebreaker. He was quite aware that Lupin had been arrested in America, by his enemy, Ganimard; that he was safely under lock and key; and that the preliminaries to his trial were now being conducted . . . with great difficulty, no doubt! But he also knew that one could always expect anything of Arsène Lupin. Besides, this precise knowledge of the castle, of the arrangement of the pictures and furniture, was a very formidable sign. Who had informed Lupin of things which nobody had ever seen?

The baron raised his eyes and gazed at the frowning outline of the Malaquis, its abrupt pedestal, the deep water that surrounds it. He shrugged his shoulders. No, there was no possible danger. No one in the world could penetrate to the inviolable sanctuary that contained his collections.

No one in the world, perhaps; but Arsène Lupin? Did doors, draw-bridges, walls so much as exist for Arsène Lupin? Of what use were the most ingeniously contrived obstacles, the most skilful precautions, once that Arsène Lupin had decided to attain a given object? . . .

That same evening, he wrote to the public prosecutor at Rouen. He enclosed the threatening letter and demanded police protection.

The reply came without delay: the said Arsène Lupin was at that moment a prisoner at the Santé, where he was kept under strict observation and not allowed to write. The letter, therefore, could only be the work of a hoaxer. Everything went to prove this: logic, common sense, and the actual facts.

However, to make quite sure, the letter had been submitted to a handwriting expert, who declared that, notwithstanding certain points of resemblance, it was not in the prisoner's writing.

"Notwithstanding certain points of resemblance." The baron saw only these five bewildering words, which he regarded as the confession of a doubt which alone should have been enough to justify the intervention of the police. His fears increased. He read the letter over and over again. "I will myself see to their removal." And that fixed date, the night of Wednesday, the 27th of September!

Of a naturally suspicious and silent disposition, he dared not unburden himself to his servants, whose devotion he did not consider proof against all tests. And yet, for the first time for many years, he felt a need to speak, to take advice. Abandoned by the police of his country, he had no hope of protecting himself by his own resources, and thought of going to Paris to beg for the assistance of some retired detective or other.

Two days elapsed. On the third day, as he sat reading his newspapers, he gave a start of delight. The Réveil de Caudebec contained the following paragraph:

"We have had the pleasure of numbering among our visitors, for nearly three weeks, Chief-Inspector Ganimard, one of the veterans of the detective-service. M. Ganimard, for whom his last feat, the arrest of Arsène Lupin, has won a European reputation, is enjoying a rest from his arduous labours and spending a short holiday fishing for bleak and gudgeon in the Seine."

Ganimard! The very man that Baron Cahorn wanted! Who could baffle Lupin's plans better than the cunning and patient Ganimard?

The baron lost no time. It is a four-mile walk from the castle to the little town of Caudebec. He did the distance with a quick and joyous step, stimulated by the hope of safety.

After many fruitless endeavours to discover the chief-inspector's address, he went to the office of the Réveil, which is on the quay. He found the writer of the paragraph, who, going to the window, said:

"Ganimard! Why, you're sure to meet him, rod in hand, on the quay. That's where I picked up with him and read his name, by accident, on his fishing-rod. Look, there he is, the little old man in the frock-coat and a straw hat, under the trees."

"A frock-coat and a straw hat?"

"Yes. He's a queer specimen, close-tongued and a trifle testy."

Five minutes later, the baron accosted the famous Ganimard, introduced himself and made an attempt to enter into conversation. Failing in this, he broached the question frankly and laid his case before him.

The other listened, without moving a muscle or taking his eyes from the water. Then he turned his head to the baron, eyed him from head to foot with a look of profound compassion and said:

"Sir, it is not usual for criminals to warn the people whom they mean to rob. Arsène Lupin, in particular, never indulges in that sort of bounce."

"Still . . ."

"Sir, if I had the smallest doubt, believe me, the pleasure of once more locking up that dear Lupin would outweigh every other consideration. Unfortunately, the youth is already in prison."

"Suppose he escapes?"

"People don't escape from the Santé."

"But Lupin . . ."

"Lupin no more than another."

"Still . . ."

"Very well, if he does escape, so much the better; I'll nab him again. Meanwhile, you can sleep soundly and stop frightening my fish."

The conversation was ended. The baron returned home feeling more or less reassured by Ganimard's indifference. He saw to his bolts, kept a watch upon his servants, and another forty-eight hours passed, during which he almost succeeded in persuading himself that, after all, his fears were groundless. There was no doubt about it: as Ganimard had said, criminals don't warn the people whom they mean to rob.

The date was drawing near. On the morning of Tuesday, the twenty-sixth, nothing particular happened. But at three o'clock in the afternoon, a boy rang and handed in this telegram :

"No goods Batignolles. Get everything ready for to-morrow night.

"ARSÈNE."

Once again, Cahorn lost his head, so much so that he asked himself whether he would not do better to yield to Arsène Lupin's demands.

He hurried off to Caudebec. Ganimard was seated on a camp-stool, fishing, in the same spot as before. The baron handed him the telegram without a word.

"Well?" said the detective.

"Well what? It's fixed for to-morrow!"

"What is?"

"The burglary! The theft of my collections!"

Ganimard turned to him and, folding his arms across his chest, cried, in a tone of impatience:

"Why, you don't really mean to say that you think I'm going to trouble myself about this stupid business?"

"What fee will you take to spend Wednesday night at the castle?"

"Not a penny. Don't bother me!"

"Name your own price. I am a rich man, a very rich man."

The brutality of the offer took Ganimard aback. He replied, more calmly:

"I am here on leave and I have no right to . . ."

"No one shall know. I undertake to be silent, whatever happens!"

"Oh, nothing will happen!"

"Well, look here; is three thousand francs enough?"

The inspector took a pinch of snuff, reflected and said:

"Very well. But it's only fair to tell you that you are throwing your money away."

"I don't mind."

"In that case . . . And besides, after all, one can never tell, with that devil of a Lupin! He must have a whole gang at his orders. . . . Are you sure of your servants?"

"Well, I . . ."

"Then we must not rely upon them. I'll wire to two of my own men; that will make us feel safer. . . . And, now, leave me; we must not be seen together. To-morrow evening, at nine o'clock."

On the morning of the next day, the date fixed by Arsène Lupin, Baron Cahorn took down his trophy of arms, polished up his pistols, and made a thorough inspection of the Malaquis, without discovering anything suspicious.

At half-past eight in the evening, he dismissed his servants for the night. They slept in a wing facing the road, but set a little way back and right at the end of the castle. As soon as he was alone, he softly opened the four doors. In a little while, he heard footsteps approaching.

Ganimard introduced his assistants, two powerfully-built fellows, with bull necks and huge, strong hands, and asked for certain explanations. After ascertaining the disposition of the place, he carefully closed and barricaded every issue by which the threatened rooms could be entered. He examined the walls, lifted up the tapestries and finally installed his detectives in the central gallery: "No nonsense, do you understand? You're not here to sleep. At the least sound open the windows on the court and call me. Keep a look-out also on the water side. Thirty feet of steep cliff doesn't frighten scoundrels of that stamp."

He locked them in, took away the keys, and said to the baron:

"And now to our post."

He had selected, as the best place in which to spend the night, a small room contrived in the thickness of the outer walls, between the two main doors. It had at one time been the watchman's lodge. A spy-hole opened upon the bridge, another upon the court. In one corner was what looked like the mouth of a well.

"You told me, did you not, monsieur le baron, that this well is the only entrance to the underground passage and that it has been stopped up since the memory of man?"

"Yes."

"Therefore, unless there should happen to be another outlet, unknown to any but Arsène Lupin, which seems pretty unlikely, we can be easy in our minds."

He placed three chairs in a row, settled himself comfortably at full length, lit his pipe and sighed:

"Upon my word, monsieur le baron, I must be very eager to build an additional storey to the little house in which I mean to end my days, to accept so elementary a job as this. I shall tell the story to our friend Lupin; he'll split his sides with laughter."

The baron did not laugh. With ears pricked up, he questioned the silence with ever-growing restlessness. From time to time, he leaned over the well and plunged an anxious eye into the yawning cavity.

The clock struck eleven; midnight; one o'clock.

Suddenly, he seized the arm of Ganimard, who woke with a start.

"Do you hear that?"

"Yes."

"What is it?"

"It's myself snoring!"

"No, no, listen . . ."

"Oh, yes, it's a motor-horn."

"Well?"

"Well, it's as unlikely that Lupin should come by motor-car as that he should use a battering-ram to demolish your castle. So I should go to sleep, if I were you, monsieur le baron . . . as I shall have the honour of doing once more. Good-night!"

This was the only alarm. Ganimard resumed his interrupted slumbers; and the baron heard nothing save his loud and regular snoring.

At break of day, they left their cell. A great calm peace, the peace of the morning by the cool waterside, reigned over the castle. Cahorn, beaming with joy, and Ganimard, placid as ever, climbed the staircase. Not a sound. Nothing suspicious.

"What did I tell you, monsieur le baron? I really ought not to have accepted . . . I feel ashamed of myself . . ."

He took the keys and entered the gallery.

On two chairs, with bent bodies and hanging arms, sat the two detectives, fast asleep.

"What, in the name of all the . . ." growled the inspector.

At the same moment, the baron uttered a cry:

"The pictures! . . . The credence-table!"

He stammered and spluttered, with his hand outstretched towards the dismantled walls, with their bare nails and slack cords. The Watteau and the two Rubens had disappeared! The tapestries had been removed, the glass cases emptied of their trinkets!

"And my Louis XVI sconces! . . . And the Regency chandelier! . . . And my twelfth century Virgin! . . ."

He ran from place to place, maddened, in despair. Distraught with rage and grief, he quoted the purchase-prices, added up his losses, piled up figures, all promiscuously, in indistinct words and incomplete phrases. He stamped his feet, flung himself about, and, in short, behaved like a ruined man who had nothing before him but suicide.

If anything could have consoled him, it would have been the sight of Ganimard's stupefaction. Contrary to the baron, the inspector did not move. He seemed petrified and, with a dazed eye, examined things. The windows? They were fastened. The locks of the doors? Untouched. There was not a crack in the ceiling, not a hole in the floor. Everything was in perfect order. The whole thing must have been carried out methodically, after an inexorable and logical plan.

"Arsène Lupin . . . Arsène Lupin," he muttered, giving way.

Suddenly he leapt upon the two detectives, as though at last overcome with rage, and shook them and swore at them furiously. They did not wake up!

"The deuce!" he said. "Can they have been . . . ?"

He bent over them and scrutinised them closely, one after the other : they were both asleep, but their sleep was not natural. He said to the baron :

"They have been drugged."

"But by whom?"

"By him, of course . . . or by his gang, acting under his instructions. It's a trick in his own manner. I recognise his touch."

"In that case, I am undone : the thing is hopeless."

"Hopeless."

"But this is abominable; it's monstrous."

"Lodge an information."

"What's the good?"

"Well, you may as well try . . . the law has its resources. . . ."

"The law ! But you can see for yourself . . . Why, at this very moment, when you might be looking for a clue, discovering something, you're not even stirring!"

"Discover something, with Arsène Lupin ! But, my dear sir, Arsène Lupin never leaves anything behind him ! There's no chance with Arsène Lupin ! I am beginning to wonder whether he got himself arrested by me of his own free will, in America !"

"Then I must give up the hope of recovering my pictures or anything ! But he has stolen the pearls of my collection. I would give a fortune to get them back. If there's nothing to be done against him, let him name his price."

Ganimard looked at him steadily :

"That's a sound notion. Do you stick to it?"

"Yes, yes, yes ! But why do you ask?"

"I have an idea."

"What idea?"

"We'll talk of it if nothing comes of the enquiry. . . . Only, not a word about me, to a soul, if you wish me to succeed."

And he added, between his teeth :

"Besides, I have nothing to be proud of."

The two men gradually recovered consciousness, with the stupefied look of men awakening from a hypnotic sleep. They opened astounded eyes, tried to make out what had happened. Ganimard questioned them. They remembered nothing.

"Still you must have seen somebody?"

"No, nobody."

"Try and think?"

"No, nobody."

"Did you have a drink?"

They reflected and one of them replied :

"Yes, I had some water."

"Out of that bottle there?"

"Yes."

"I had some too," said the other.

Ganimard smelt the water, tasted it. It had no particular scent or flavour.

"Come," he said, "we are wasting our time. Problems set by Arsène Lupin can't be solved in five minutes. But, by Jingo, I swear I'll catch him! He's won the second bout. The rubber game to me!"

That day, a charge of aggravated larceny was brought by Baron Cahorn against Arsène Lupin, a prisoner awaiting trial at the Santé.

The baron often regretted having laid his information when he saw the Malaquis made over to the gendarmes, the public prosecutor, the examining magistrate, the newspaper-reporters, and all the inquisitive people who worm themselves in wherever they have no business to be.

Already the case was filling the public mind. It had taken place under such peculiar conditions, and the name of Arsène Lupin excited men's imaginations to such a pitch that the most fantastic stories crowded the columns of the press and found acceptance with the public.

But the original letter of Arsène Lupin, which was published in the Echo de France—and no one ever knew who had supplied the text—the letter in which Baron Cahorn was insolently warned of what threatened him, caused the greatest excitement. Fabulous explanations were offered forthwith. The old legends were revived. The newspapers reminded their readers of the existence of the famous subterranean passages. And the public prosecutor, influenced by these statements, pursued his search in that direction.

The castle was ransacked from top to bottom. Every stone was examined; the wainscotings and chimneys, the frames of the mirrors and the rafters of the ceilings were carefully inspected. By the light of torches, the searchers investigated the immense cellars in which the lords of the Malaquis had been used to pile up their provisions and munitions of war. They sounded the very bowels of the rock. All to no purpose. They discovered not the slightest trace of a tunnel. No secret passage existed.

Very well, was the answer on every side; but pictures and furniture don't vanish like ghosts. They go out through doors and windows; and the people that take them also go in and out through doors and windows. Who are these people? How did they get in? And how did they get out?

The public prosecutor of Rouen, persuaded of his own incompetence, asked for the assistance of the Paris police. M. Dudouis, the chief of the detective-service, sent the most efficient bloodhounds in his employ. He himself paid a forty-eight hours' visit to the Malaquis, but met with no greater success.

It was after his return that he sent for Chief-inspector Ganimard, whose services he had so often had occasion to value.

Ganimard listened in silence to the instructions of his superior, and then, tossing his head, said :

"I think we shall be on a false scent so long as we continue to search the castle. The solution lies elsewhere."

"With Arsène Lupin? If you think that, then you believe that he took part in the burglary."

"I do think so. I go further, I consider it certain."

"Come, Ganimard, this is absurd. Arsène Lupin is in prison."

"Arsène Lupin is in prison, I agree. He is being watched, I grant you. But, if he had his legs in irons, his hands bound and his mouth gagged, I should still be of the same opinion."

"But why this persistency?"

"Because no one else is capable of contriving a plan on so large a scale and of contriving it in such a way that it succeeds . . . as this has succeeded."

"Words, Ganimard!"

"They are true words, for all that. Only, it's no use looking for underground passages, for stones that turn on a pivot and stuff and nonsense of that kind. Our friend does not employ such antiquated measures. He is a man of to-day, or rather of to-morrow."

"And what do you conclude?"

"I conclude by asking you straight to let me spend an hour with Lupin."

"In his cell?"

"Yes. We were on excellent terms during the crossing from America, and I venture to think that he is not without friendly feeling for the man who arrested him. If he can tell me what I want to know, without compromising himself, he will be quite willing to spare ~~me~~ an unnecessary journey."

It was just after mid-day when Ganimard was shown into Arsène Lupin's cell. Lupin, who was lying on his bed, raised his head and uttered an exclamation of delight:

"Well, this is a surprise! Dear old Ganimard here!"

"Himself."

"I have hoped for many things in this retreat of my own choosing, but for none more eagerly than the pleasure of welcoming you here."

"You are too good."

"Not at all, not at all. I have the liveliest regard for you."

"I am proud to hear it."

"I have said it a thousand times: Ganimard is our greatest detective. He's almost—see how frank I am—almost as clever as Holmlock Shears. But, really, I'm awfully sorry to have nothing better than this stool to offer you. And not a drink of any kind! Not so much as a glass of beer! Do forgive me: I am only just passing through town, you see!"

Ganimard smiled and sat down on the stool; and the prisoner, glad of the opportunity of speaking, continued:

"By Jove, what a treat to see a decent man's face! I am sick of the looks of all these spies who go through my cell and my pockets ten times a day to make sure that I am not planning an escape. Gad, how fond the Government must be of me!"

"They show their judgment."

"No, no! I should be so happy if they would let me lead my own quiet life."

"On other people's money."

"Just so. It would be so simple. But I'm letting my tongue run on, I'm talking nonsense, and I dare say you're in a hurry. Come, Ganimard, tell me to what I owe the honour of this visit."

"The Cahorn case," said Ganimard, abruptly.

"Stop! Wait a bit . . . You see, I have so many on hand! First, let me search my brain for the Cahorn pigeon-hole . . . Ah, I have it! Cahorn case, Chateau du Malaquis, Seine-Inférieure . . . Two Rubens, a Watteau, and a few more trifles."

"Trifles!"

"Oh, yes, all this is of small importance. I have bigger things on hand. However, you're interested in the case and that's enough for me . . . Go ahead, Ganimard."

"I need not tell you, need I, how far we have got with the investigation?"

"No, not at all. I have seen the morning papers. And I will even take the liberty of saying that you are not making much progress."

"That's just why I have come to throw myself upon your kindness."

"I am entirely at your service."

"First of all, the thing was done by you, was it not?"

"From start to finish."

"The registered letter? The telegram?"

"Were sent by yours truly. In fact, I ought to have the receipts somewhere."

Arsène opened the drawer of a little deal table which, with the bed and the stool, composed all the furniture of his cell, took out two scraps of paper and handed them to Ganimard.

"Hullo!" cried the latter. "Why, I thought you were being kept under constant observation and searched on the slightest pretext. And it appears that you read the papers and collect post-office receipts . . ."

"Bah! Those men are such fools. They rip up the lining of my waistcoat, explore the soles of my boots, listen at the walls of my cell; but not one of them would believe that Arsène Lupin could be such a fool as to choose so obvious a hiding-place. That's just what I reckoned on."

Ganimard exclaimed, in amusement:

"What a funny chap you are! You're beyond me. Come, tell me the story."

"Oh, I say! Not so fast! Initiate you into all my secrets . . . reveal my little tricks to you? That's a serious matter."

"Was I wrong in thinking that I could rely on you to oblige me?"

"No, Ganimard, and, as you insist upon it . . ."

Arsène Lupin took two or three strides across his cell. Then, stopping:

"What do you think of my letter to the baron?" he asked.

"I think you wanted to have some fun, to tickle the gallery a bit."

"Ah, there you go! Tickle the gallery, indeed! Upon my word, Ganimard, I gave you credit for more sense! Do you really imagine that I, Arsène Lupin, waste my time with such childish pranks as that? Is it likely that I should have written the letter, if I could have rifled the baron without it? Do try and understand that the letter was the indispensable starting-point, the mainspring that ~~set~~ the whole machine in motion. Look here, let us proceed in order, and, if you like, prepare the Malaquis burglary together."

"Very well."

"Now follow ~~me~~. I have to do with an impregnable and closely-guarded castle. . . . Am I to throw up the game and forego the treasures which I covet, because the castle that contains them happens ~~to~~ be inaccessible?"

"Clearly not."

"Am I to try to carry it by assault as in the old days, at the head of a band of adventurers?"

"That would be childish."

"Am I to enter it by stealth?"

"Impossible."

"There remains only one way, which is to get myself invited by the owner of the aforesaid castle."

"It's an original idea."

"And so easy! Suppose that, one day, the said owner receives a letter warning him of a plot hatched against him by one Arsène Lupin, a notorious housebreaker. What is he sure to do?"

"Send the letter to the public prosecutor."

"Who will laugh at him, because the said Lupin is actually under lock and key. The natural consequence is the utter bewilderment of the worthy man, who is ready and anxious to ask for the assistance of the first comer. Am I right?"

"Quite so."

"And, if he happens to read in the local rag that a famous detective is staying in the neighbourhood . . .?"

"He will go and apply to that detective."

"Exactly. But, on the other hand, let us assume that, foreseeing this inevitable step, Arsène Lupin has asked one of his ablest friends to take up his quarters at Caudebec, to pick up acquaintance with a contributor to the Réveil, a paper, mark you, to which the baron subscribes, and ~~to~~ drop a hint that he is so-and-so, the famous detective. What will happen next?"

"The contributor will send a paragraph to the Réveil stating that the detective is staying at Caudebec."

"Exactly; and one of two things follows: either the fish—I mean Cahorn—does not rise to the bait, in which case nothing happens. Or else—and this is the more likely presumption—he nibbles, in which case you have our dear Cahorn imploring the assistance of one of my own friends against me!"

"This is becoming more and more original."

"Of course, the sham detective begins by refusing. Thereupon, a telegram from Arsène Lupin. Dismay of the baron, who renews his entreaties with my friend and offers him so much to watch over his safety. The friend aforesaid accepts and brings with him two chaps of our gang, who, during the night, while Cahorn is kept in sight by his protector, remove a certain number of things through the window and lower them with ropes into a barge freighted for the purpose. It's as simple as . . . Lupin."

"And it's just wonderful," cried Ganimard, "and I have no words in which to praise the boldness of the idea and the ingenuity of the details. But I can hardly imagine a detective so illustrious that his name should have attracted and impressed the baron to that extent."

"There is one and one only."

"Who?"

"The most illustrious of them all, the arch-enemy of Arsène Lupin, in short, Inspector Ganimard."

"What, myself?"

"Yourself, Ganimard. And that's the delightful part of it: if you go down and persuade the baron to talk, you will end by discovering that it is your duty to arrest yourself, just as you arrested me in America. A humorous revenge, what? I shall have Ganimard arrested by Ganimard!"

Arsène Lupin laughed loud and long, while the inspector bit his lips with vexation. The joke did not appear to him worthy of so much merriment.

The entrance of a warder gave him time to recover. The man brought the meal which Arsène Lupin, by special favour, was allowed to have sent in from the neighbouring restaurant. After placing the tray on the table, he went away. Arsène sat down, broke his bread, ate a mouthful or two and continued :

"But be easy, my dear Ganimard, you won't have to go. I have something to tell you that will strike you dumb. The Cahorn case is about to be withdrawn."

"What!"

"About to be withdrawn, I said."

"Nonsense! I have just left the chief."

"And then? Does Monsieur Dudouis know more than I do about my concerns? You must learn that Ganimard—excuse me—that the sham Ganimard remained on very good terms with Baron Cahorn. The baron—and this is his main reason for keeping the thing quiet—charged him with the very delicate mission of negotiating a deal with me; and the chances are that, by this time, on payment of a certain sum, the baron is once more in possession of his pet knick-knacks. In return for which he will withdraw the charge. Wherefore there is no question of theft. Wherefore the public prosecutor will have to abandon . . ."

Ganimard gazed at the prisoner with an air of stupefaction :

"But how do you know all this?"

"I have just received the telegram I was expecting."

"You have just received a telegram?"

"This very moment, my friend. I was too polite to read it in your presence. But, if you will allow me . . ."

"You're poking fun at me, Lupin."

"Have the kindness, my friend, to cut off the top of that egg, gently. You will see for yourself that I am not poking fun at you."

Ganimard obeyed mechanically and broke the egg with the blade of a knife. A cry of surprise escaped him. The shell was empty but for a sheet of blue paper. At Arsène's request, he unfolded it. It was a telegram, or rather a portion of a telegram from which the postal indications had been removed. He read :

“Arrangement settled. Hundred thousand paid over, delivered. All well.”

“Hundred thousand paid over?” he uttered.

“Yes, a hundred thousand francs. It’s not much, but these are hard times. . . . And my general expenses are so heavy! If you knew the amount of my budget . . . it’s like the budget of a big town!”

Ganimard rose to go. His ill-humour had left him. He thought for a few moments and cast a mental glance over the whole business, trying to discover a weak point. Then, in a voice that frankly revealed his admiration as an expert, he said :

“It’s a good thing that there are not dozens like you, or there would be nothing for us but to shut up shop.”

Arsène Lupin assumed a modest simper and replied :

“Oh, I had to do something to amuse myself, to occupy my spare time . . . especially as the scoop could only succeed while I was in prison.”

“What do you mean?” exclaimed Ganimard. “Your trial, your defence, your examination : isn’t that enough for you to amuse yourself with?”

“No, because I have decided not to attend my trial.”

“Oh, I say!”

Arsène Lupin repeated, deliberately :

“I shall not attend my trial.”

“Really!”

“Why, my dear fellow, you surely don’t think that I mean to rot in gaol? The mere suggestion is an insult. Let me tell you that Arsène Lupin remains in prison as long as he thinks fit and not a moment longer.”

“It might have been more prudent to begin by not entering it,” said the inspector. ironically.

“Ah, so you’re chaffing me, sirrah? Do you remember that you had the honour to effect my arrest? Well, learn from me, my respectable friend, that no one, neither you nor another, could have laid a hand upon me, if a much more important interest had not occupied my attention at that critical moment."

"You surprise me."

"A woman had cast her eyes upon me, Ganimard, and I loved her. Do you realise all that the fact implies when a woman whom one loves casts her eyes upon one? I cared about little else, I assure you. And that is why I am here."

"You've been here a long time, allow me to observe."

"I was anxious to forget. Don't laugh : it ~~was~~ a charming adventure and I still have a tender recollection of it . . . And then I have had a slight nervous break-down. We lead such a feverish existence nowadays! It's a good thing to take a rest-cure from time to time. And there's no place for it like this. They carry out the cure in all its strictness at the Santé."

"Arsène Lupin," said Ganimard, "you're pulling my leg."

"Ganimard," replied Lupin, "this is Friday. On Wednesday next, I'll come and smoke a cigar with you, in the Rue Pergolèse at four o'clock in the afternoon."

"Arsène Lupin, I shall expect you."

They shook hands like two friends who have a proper sense of each other's value and the old detective turned towards the door.

"Ganimard!"

Ganimard looked round :

"What is it?"

"Ganimard, you've forgotten your watch."

"My watch?"

"Yes, I've just found it in my pocket."

He returned it with apologies :

"Forgive me . . . it's a bad habit . . . They've taken mine, but that's no reason why I should rob you of yours. Especially as I have a chronometer here which keeps perfect time and satisfies all my requirements."

He took out of the drawer a large, thick, comfortable-looking gold watch, hanging to a heavy chain.

“And out of whose pocket does this come?” asked Ganimard.

Arsène Lupin carelessly inspected the initials:

“J. B. . . . What on earth does that stand for? . . . Oh, yes, I remember: Jules Bouvier, my examining magistrate, a charming fellow. . . .”

THE ESCAPE OF ARSÈNE LUPIN

THE ESCAPE OF ARSÈNE LUPIN

ARSÈNE LUPIN finished his mid-day meal, took a good cigar from his pocket and complacently studied the gold-lettered inscription on the band. At that moment, the door of his cell opened. He had just a second in which to throw the cigar into the drawer of the table and to move away. The warder came in to tell him that it was time to take his exercise.

"I was waiting for you, old chap," cried Lupin, with unfailing good-humour.

They went out together. Hardly had they turned the corner of the passage when two men entered the cell and began to make a minute examination. One of these was Inspector Dieuzy, the other Inspector Folenfant.

They wanted to have the matter settled, once for all. There was no doubt about it: Arsène Lupin was keeping up a correspondence with the outside world and communicating with his chums. Only the day before the Grand Journal had published the following lines, addressed to its legal contributor:

"SIR,

"In an article published a few days ago you ventured to express yourself concerning me in utterly unwarrantable terms. I shall come and call you to account a day or two before my trial commences.

"Yours faithfully,
"ARSÈNE LUPIN."

The handwriting was Arsène Lupin's. Therefore he was sending letters. Therefore he was receiving letters. Therefore it was certain that he was preparing the escape which he had so arrogantly announced.

The position was becoming intolerable. By arrangement with the examining magistrate, M. Dudouis himself, the head of the detective-service, went to the Santé to explain to the prison-governor the measures which it was thought advisable to take. And, on his arrival, he sent two of his men to the prisoner's cell.

The men raised every one of the flagstones, took the bed to pieces, did all that is usually done in such cases and ended by discovering nothing. They were about to abandon their search when the warder came running in and said:

"The drawer . . . look in the drawer of the table. I thought I saw him shut it, when I came in just now."

They looked and Dieuzy exclaimed:

"Gad we've caught our customer this time!"

Folenfant stopped him:

"Don't do anything, my lad; let the chief take the inventory."

"Still, this Havana . . ."

"Leave it alone and let us tell the chief."

Two minutes later, M. Dudouis was exploring the contents of the drawer. He found, first, a collection of press-cuttings concerning Arsène Lupin; next, a tobacco-pouch, a pipe and some foreign post-paper; and, lastly, two books.

He looked at the titles: Carlyle's "Heroes and Hero-worship," in English, and a charming Elzevir, in the contemporary binding: a German translation of the "Manual of Epictetus," published at Leyden in 1634. He glanced through them and observed that every page was scored, underlined and annotated. Were these conventional signs, or were they marks denoting the reader's devotion to a particular book?

"We'll go into this in detail," said M. Dudouis.

He investigated the tobacco-pouch, the pipe. Then, taking up the magnificent cigar, in its gold band:

"By Jove!" he cried. "Our friend does himself well. A Henry Clay!"

With the mechanical movement of a smoker, he put it to his ear and crackled it. An exclamation escaped him.

The cigar had given way under the pressure of his fingers. He examined it more attentively and soon perceived something that showed white between the leaves of the tobacco. And, carefully, with the aid of a pin, he drew out a very thin scroll of paper, no thicker than a tooth-pick. It was a note. He unrolled it and read the following words, in a small, female hand :

"Maria has taken the other's place. Eight out of ten are prepared. On pressing outside foot, metal panel moves upward. H. P. will wait from 12 to 16 daily. But where? Reply at once. Have no fear: your friend is looking after you."

M. Dudouis reflected for a moment and said :

"That's clear enough . . . Maria, the prison-van . . . the eight compartments. . . . Twelve to sixteen, that is from twelve to four o'clock. . . ."

"But who is H. P., who is to wait for him?"

"H. P. stands for horse-power, of course: a motor-car."

He rose and asked :

"Had the prisoner finished his lunch?"

"Yes."

"And as he has not read this message, as the condition of the cigar shows, the chances are that he had only just received it."

"By what means?"

"How can I tell? In his food; inside a roll or a potato."

"That's impossible: he was only allowed to have his meals from the outside so that we might trap him; and we have found nothing."

"We will look for Lupin's reply this evening. Meantime, keep him out of his cell. I will take this to Monsieur Bouvier, the examining magistrate. If he agrees, we will have the letter photographed at once; and, in an hour's time, you can put these other things back in the drawer, together with an exactly similar cigar, containing the original message. The prisoner must not be allowed to suspect anything."

It was not without a certain curiosity that M. Dudouis, accompanied by Inspector Dieuzy, returned to the office of the Santé in the evening. In a corner, on the stove, were three plates.

"Has he had his dinner?"

"Yes," replied the governor.

"Dieuzy, cut those pieces of macaroni into very thin shreds, and open that bit of bread. . . . Is there nothing there?"

"No, sir."

M. Dudouis examined the plates, the fork, the spoon and, lastly, the knife, a regulation knife with a rounded blade. He twisted the handle to the left and then to the right. When turned to the right, the handle gave way and became unscrewed. The knife was hollow and served as a sheath for a slip of paper.

"Pooh!" he said. "That's not very artful, for a man like Arsène. But let us waste no time. Do you go to the restaurant, Dieuzy, and make your enquiries."

Then he read:

"I leave it to you. Let H. P. follow every day, at a distance. I shall go in front. I shall see you soon, my dear and admirable friend."

"At last!" cried M. Dudouis, rubbing his hands. "Things are going better, I think. With a little assistance from our side, the escape will succeed . . . just enough to enable us to bag the accomplices."

"And suppose Arsène Lupin slips through your fingers?" said the governor.

"We shall employ as many men as are necessary. If, however, he shows himself too clever . . . well, then, so much the worse for him! As for the rest of the gang, since the leader refuses to talk, the others must be made to."

The fact was that Arsène Lupin did not talk much. For some months, M. Jules Bouvier, the examining magistrate, had been exerting himself to no purpose. The interrogatories were reduced to uninteresting colloquies between the magistrate and Maître Danval, one of the shining lights of the bar, who, for that matter, knew as much and as little about the defendant as the man in the street.

From time to time, out of politeness, Arsène Lupin would let fall a remark :

“Quite so, sir, we agree. The robbery at the Crédit Lyonnais, the robbery in the Rue de Babylone, the uttering of the forged notes, the affair of the insurance policies, the burglaries at the Châteaux d’Armesnil, de Gouret, d’Imblevain, des Groseillers, du Malaquis : that’s all my work.”

“Then, perhaps you will explain . . .”

“There’s no need to : I confess to everything, in the lump ; everything and ten times as much.”

Tired out, the magistrate had suspended these wearisome interrogatories. He resumed them after being shown the two intercepted missives. And, regularly, at twelve o’clock, Arsène Lupin was taken from the Santé to the police-station in a van, with a number of other prisoners. They left again at three or four in the day.

One afternoon, the return journey took place under exceptional conditions. As the other criminals from the Santé had not yet been examined, it was decided to take Arsène Lupin back first. He, therefore, stepped into the van alone.

These prison-vans, vulgarly known as paniers à salade, or salad-baskets, in France, and as “Black Marias” in England, are divided lengthwise by a central passage, giving admittance to ten compartments or boxes, five on each side. Each of these boxes is so contrived that its occupant has to adopt a sitting posture. A municipal guard sits at the end and watches the central passage.

Arsène was placed in the third box on the right and the heavy vehicle started. He perceived that they had left the Quai de l’Horloge and were passing before the Palais de Justice. When they reached the middle of the Pont Saint-

Michel, he pressed his outer foot, that is to say, his right foot, ~~as~~ he had always done, against the sheet-iron panel that closed his cell. Suddenly, something was thrown out of gear and the panel opened imperceptibly outwards. He saw that he ~~was~~ just between the two wheels.

He waited, with a watchful eye. The van went along the Boulevard Saint-Michel at a foot's pace. At the Carrefour Saint-Germain, it pulled up. A dray-horse had fallen. The traffic was stopped and soon there was a block of cabs and omnibuses.

Arsène Lupin put out his head. Another prison-van was standing beside the one in which he ~~was~~ sitting. He opened the panel a little more, put his foot on one of the spokes of the hind-wheel and jumped to the ground.

A cab-driver ~~saw~~ him, choked with laughter and then tried to call out. But his voice ~~was~~ lost in the din of the traffic, which had started afresh. Besides, Arsène Lupin ~~was~~ already some distance away.

He had taken a few steps at a run; but after crossing to the left-hand pavement, he turned back, cast a glance around him and seemed to be drawing breath, like a man who is not quite sure which direction he means to follow. Then, making up his mind, he thrust his hands into his pockets and, with the careless air of a person taking a stroll, continued to walk along the boulevard.

The weather ~~was~~ mild: it was a bright warm autumn day. The cafés were full. Arsène sat down outside one.

He called for a bock and a packet of cigarettes. He emptied his glass with little sips, calmly smoked a cigarette and lit a second. Lastly, he stood up and asked the waiter to fetch the manager.

The manager came and Arsène said, loud enough to be heard by all around:

"I am very sorry, but I have come out without my purse. Perhaps you know my name and will not mind trusting me for a day or two: I am Arsène Lupin."

The manager looked at him, thinking he ~~was~~ joking. But Arsène repeated:

"Lupin, a prisoner at the Santé, just escaped. I venture to hope that my name inspires you with every confidence."

And he walked away amid the general laughter, before the other dreamed of raising a protest.

He slanted across the Rue Soufflot and turned down the Rue Saint-Jacques. He proceeded along this street quietly, looking at the shop-windows and smoking one cigarette after the other. On reaching the Boulevard de Port-Royal, he took his bearings, asked the way and walked straight towards the Rue de la Santé. Soon, the tall, frowning walls of the prison came into view. He skirted them and, going up to the municipal guard who was standing sentry at the gate, he raised his hat and said:

"Is this the Santé Prison?"

"Yes."

"I want to go back to my cell, please. The van dropped me on the way and I should not like to abuse . . ."

The guard grunted:

"See here, my man, you just go your way and look sharp about it!"

"I beg your pardon, but my road lies through this gate. And, if you keep Arsène Lupin out, it may cost you dear, my friend."

"Arsène Lupin! What's all this?"

"I am sorry I haven't a card on me," said Arsène, pretending to feel in his pockets.

The guard, utterly nonplussed, eyed him from head to foot. Then, without a word and as though in spite of himself, he rang a bell. The iron door opened.

A few minutes later, the governor hurried into the office, gesticulating and pretending to be in a violent rage. Arsène smiled:

"Come, sir, don't try that on with me! What! You take the precaution to bring me back alone in the van, you prepare a nice little block in the traffic and you think that I am going to take to my heels and rejoin my friends! And what about the twenty detectives escorting us on foot, on bicycles and in cabs? They'd have made short work of me: I should never have got off alive! Perhaps, that was what they were reckoning on?" Shrugging his shoulders, he added, "I beg of you, sir, don't let them trouble about me. When I decide to escape I shall want nobody's assistance."

Two days later, the Echo de France, which was undoubtedly becoming the official gazette of the exploits of Arsène Lupin—he was said to be one of the principal shareholders—published the fullest details of his attempted escape. The exact text of the letters exchanged between the prisoner and his mysterious woman friend, the means employed for this correspondence, the part played by the police, the drive along the Boulevard Saint-Michel, the incident at the Café Soufflot: everything was told in print. It was known that the enquiries of Inspector Dieuzy among the waiters of the restaurant had led to no result. And, in addition, the public were made aware of this bewildering fact, which showed the infinite variety of the resources which the man had at his disposal: the prison-van in which he had been carried was "faked" from end to end and had been substituted by his accomplices for one of the six regular vans that compose the prison service.

No one entertained any further doubt as to Arsène Lupin's coming escape. He himself proclaimed it in categorical terms, as was shown by his reply to M. Bouvier on the day after the incident. The magistrate having bantered him on the check which he had encountered, Lupin looked at him and said, coolly:

"Listen to me, sir, and take my word for it; this attempted escape formed part of my plan of escape."

"I don't understand," grinned the magistrate.

"There is no need that you should."

And, when, in the course of this private interrogatory, which appeared at full length in the columns of the Echo de France, the magistrate resumed his cross-examination, Lupin exclaimed, with a weary air:

"Oh dear, oh dear, oh dear! What is the use of going on? All these questions have no importance whatever."

"How do you mean, no importance?"

"Of course not, seeing that I shall not attend my trial."

"You will not attend . . .?"

"No; it's a fixed idea of mine, an irrevocable decision. Nothing will induce me to depart from it."

This assurance, combined with the inexplicable indiscretions committed day after day, ended by enervating and disconcerting the officers of the law. Secrets were revealed, known to Arsène Lupin alone, the divulging of which could therefore come from none but him. But with what object did he divulge them? And by what means?

They changed Arsène Lupin's cell, moved him to a lower floor. The magistrate, on his side, closed the examination and delivered the materials for the indictment.

A two months' silence ensued. These two months Arsène Lupin passed stretched on his bed, with his face almost constantly turned to the wall. The change of cell seemed to have crushed his spirits. He refused to see his counsel. He exchanged hardly a word with the warders.

In the fortnight immediately preceding the trial, he seemed to revive. He complained of lack of air. He was sent into the yard for exercise, very early in the morning, with a man on either side of him.

Meanwhile, public curiosity had not abated. The news of his escape was expected daily. It was almost hoped for, so greatly had he caught the fancy of the crowd with his pluck, his gaiety, his variety, his inventive genius, and the mystery of his life. Arsène Lupin was bound to escape. It was inevitable. People were even astonished that he put it off so long. Every morning, the prefect of police asked his secretary :

"Well, isn't he gone yet?"

"No, sir."

"Then he will be to-morrow."

And, on the day before the trial, a gentleman called at the office of the Grand Journal, asked to see the legal contributor, flung his card at his head and made a rapid exit. The card bore the words :

“Arsène Lupin always keeps his promise.”

It was in these conditions that the trial opened.

The crowd was enormous. Everybody wanted to see the famous Arsène Lupin and was enjoying in advance the way in which he was sure to baffle the presiding judge. The court was thronged with barristers, magistrates, reporters, artists, society men and women, with all, in fact, that go to make up a first-night audience in Paris.

It was raining; the light was bad outside; it was difficult to see Arsène Lupin when the warder ushered him into the dock. However, his torpid attitude, the manner in which he let himself fall into his chair, his indifferent and passive lack of movement, did not tell in his favour. His counsel—one of Maître Danval’s “devils,” the great man himself having regarded the part to which he was reduced as beneath him—spoke to him several times. He jerked his head and made no reply.

The clerk of the court read the indictment. Then the presiding judge said :

“Prisoner at the bar, stand up. Give your name, your age and your occupation.”

Receiving no answer, he repeated :

“Your name. What is your name?”

A thick and tired voice articulated the words :

“Désiré Baudru.”

There was a murmur in court. But the judge retorted :

“Désiré Baudru? Is this a new incarnation? As it is about the eighth name to which you lay claim and no doubt as imaginary as the rest, we will keep, if you don’t mind, to that of Arsène Lupin, under which you are more favourably known.”

The judge consulted his notes and continued :

“For, notwithstanding all enquiries, it has been impossible to reconstruct your identity. You present the case, almost unparalleled in our modern society, of man without a past. We do not know who you are, whence you come, where your childhood was spent. In short we know nothing about you. You sprang up suddenly, three years ago, from an uncertain source, to reveal yourself as Arsène Lupin, that is to say, as a curious compound of intelligence and perversity, of criminality and generosity. The data which we have concerning you before that time are of the nature of suppositions. It seems probable that the so-called Rostat, who, eight years ago, was acting as assistant to Dickson, the conjuror, was none other than Arsène Lupin. It seems probable that the Russian student who, six years ago, used to attend Dr. Altier's laboratory at St. Louis' Hospital, and who often astonished the master by the ingenious character of his hypothesis on bacteriology and by the boldness of his experiments in the diseases of the skin, it seems probable that he too was none other than Arsène Lupin. So was the professor of Japanese wrestling who established himself in Paris long before jui-jitsu had been heard of. So, we believe, was the racing cyclist who won the great prize at the Exhibition, took his ten thousand francs and has never been seen since. So, perhaps, was the man who saved so many people from burning at the Charity Bazaar, helping them through the little dormer window . . . and robbing them of their belongings."

The judge paused for a moment and concluded :

"Such was that period, which seems to have been devoted entirely to a careful preparation for the struggle upon which you had embarked against society, a methodical apprenticeship in which you improved your powers, your energy and your skill to the highest pitch of perfection. Do you admit the accuracy of these facts?"

During this speech, the defendant had shifted from foot to foot, with rounded back and arms hanging slackly before him. As the light increased, the spectators were able to distinguish his extreme emaciation, his sunken jaws, his curiously prominent cheek-bones, his sallow face, mottled with little red stains and framed in a sparse and straggling beard. Prison had greatly aged and withered him. The clean-cut profile, the attractive and youthful features, which had been so many times reproduced in the papers, had passed away beyond all recognition.

He seemed not to have heard the question. It was twice repeated to him. At last he raised his eyes, appeared to think, and then, making a violent effort, muttered :

“Désiré Baudru.”

The judge laughed :

“I fail to follow exactly the system of defence which you have adopted, Arsène Lupin. If it be to play the irresponsible imbecile, you must please yourself. As far as I am concerned, I shall go straight to the point, without troubling about your fancies.”

And he enumerated in detail the robberies, swindles, and forgeries ascribed to Arsène Lupin. Occasionally, he put a question to the prisoner. The latter gave a grunt or made no reply. Witness after witness entered the box. The evidence of several of them was insignificant; others delivered more important testimony; but all of them had one characteristic in common, which was that each contradicted the other. The trial was shrouded in a puzzling obscurity, until Chief-Inspector Ganimard was called, when the general interest revived.

Nevertheless, the veteran detective caused a certain disappointment from the first. He seemed not so much shy—he was too old a hand for that—as restless and ill at ease. He kept turning his eyes towards the prisoner with visible embarrassment. However, with his two hands resting on the ledge of the box, he described the incidents in which he had taken part, his pursuit of Lupin across Europe, his arrival in America. And the crowded court listened to him greedily, as it would have listened to the story of the most exciting adventures. But, towards the close of his evidence, twice over, after alluding to his interviews with Arsène Lupin, he stopped, with an absent and undecided air.

It was obvious that he was under the influence of some obsession. The judge said :

"If you are not feeling well, you can stand down, and continue your evidence later."

"No, no, only . . ."

He stopped, took a long and penetrating look at the prisoner and said:

"Might I be allowed to see the prisoner more closely? There is a mystery which I want to clear up."

He stepped across to the dock, gazed at the prisoner longer still, concentrating all his attention upon him, and returned to the witness-box. Then, in a solemn voice, he said:

"May it please the court, I swear that the man before me is not Arsène Lupin."

A great silence greeted these words. The judge, at first taken aback, exclaimed:

"What do you mean? What are you saying? You are mad!"

The inspector declared deliberately:

"At first sight, one might be deceived by a likeness which, I admit, exists; but it needs only a momentary examination. The nose, the mouth, the hair, the colour of the skin: why it's not Arsène Lupin at all! And look at the eyes: did he ever have those drunkard's eyes?"

"Come, come, explain yourself, witness. What do you mean?"

"I don't know. He must have substituted in his place and stead some poor wretch who would have been found guilty in his place and stead . . . unless this man is an accomplice."

This unexpected dénouement caused the greatest sensation in the court. Cries of laughter and astonishment rose from every side. The judge gave instructions for the attendance of the examining magistrate, the governor of the Santé and the warders, and suspended the sitting.

After the adjournment, M. Bouvier and the governor, on being confronted with the prisoner, declared that there was only a very slight resemblance in features between the man and Arsène Lupin.

"But, in that case," exclaimed the judge, "who is this man? Where does he come from? How does he come to be in the dock?"

The two warders from the Santé were called. To the general astonishment, they recognised the prisoner, whom it had been their business to watch by turns. The judge drew a breath.

But one of the warders went on to say:

"Yes, yes, I think it's the man."

"What do you mean by saying you think?"

"Well, I hardly ever saw him. He was handed over to me at night and, for two months, he was always lying on his bed, with his face to the wall."

"But before those two months?"

"Oh, before that, he was not in Cell 24."

The governor of the prison explained:

"We changed his cell after his attempted escape."

"But you, as governor, must have seen him since the last two months."

"No, I had no occasion to see him . . . he kept quiet."

"And this man is not the prisoner who was given into your keeping?"

"No."

"Then who is he?"

"I don't know."

"We have, therefore, to do with a substitution of persons effected two months ago. How do you explain it?"

"I can't explain it."

"Then . . ."

In despair, the judge turned to the prisoner, and, in a coaxing voice, said:

"Prisoner, cannot you explain to me how and since when you come to be in the hands of the law?"

It seemed as though this benevolent tone disarmed the man's suspicion or stimulated his understanding. He strove to reply. At last, skilfully and kindly questioned, he succeeded in putting together a few sentences, which revealed that, two months before, he had been taken to the police-station and charged with vagrancy. He spent a night and a morning in the cells. Being found to possess a sum of seventy-five centimes, he was dismissed. But, as he was crossing the yard, two officers had caught him by the arm and taken him to the prison van. Since that time, he had been living in Cell 24. . . . He had been comfortable. Had had plenty to eat. . . . Had slept pretty well. . . . So had not protested. . . .

All this seemed probable. Amid laughter and great excitement, the judge adjourned the case to another sitting for further enquiries.

The enquiries forthwith revealed the existence of an entry in the gaol-book to the effect that, eight weeks previously, a man of the name of Désiré Baudru had spent the night at the police-station. He was released the next day and left the station at two o'clock in the afternoon. Well, at two o'clock on that day, Arsène Lupin, after undergoing his final examination, had left the police-station in the prison-van for the Santé.

Had the warders made a mistake? Had they themselves, in an inattentive moment, deceived by the superficial likeness, substituted this man for their prisoner? This seemed hardly possible in view of the length of their service.

Had the substitution been planned in advance? Apart from the fact that the disposition of the localities made this almost unrealisable, it would have been necessary, in that case, that Baudru should be an accomplice and cause himself to be arrested with the one and only object of taking Arsène Lupin's place. But, then, by what miracle could a plan of this sort have succeeded, based as it was entirely on a series of improbable chances, of fortuitous meetings, and fabulous mistakes?

Désiré Baudru was subjected to the anthropometrical test: there was not a single record corresponding with his description. Besides, traces of him were easily discovered. He was known at Courbevoie, at Asnières, at Levallois. He lived by begging and slept in one of those rag-pickers' huts of which there are so many near the Barrière des Ternes. He had disappeared from sight for about a year.

Had he been suborned by Arsène Lupin? There were no grounds for thinking so. And, even if this were so, it threw no light upon the prisoner's escape. The marvel remained as extraordinary as before. Of a score of suppositions put forward in explanation, not one was satisfactory. Of the escape alone there was no doubt: an incomprehensible, sensational escape, in which the public as well as the authorities felt the effort of a long preparation, a combination of wonderfully dove-tailed actions. And the upshot of it all was to justify Arsène Lupin's boastful prophecy:

"I shall not be present at my trial."

After a month of careful investigations, the puzzle continued to present the same inscrutable character. Still, it was impossible to keep that poor wretch of a Baudru locked up indefinitely. To try him would have been absurd: what charge was there against him? The magistrate signed the order for his release. But the head of the detective-service resolved to keep an active watch upon his movements.

The idea was suggested by Ganimard. In his opinion, there was no complicity and no accident in the matter. Baudru was a tool whom Arsène Lupin had employed with his amazing skill. With Baudru at large, they might hope, through him, to come upon Arsène Lupin, or, at least, upon one of his gang.

Inspectors Folenfant and Dieuzy were told off as assistants to Ganimard; and, one foggy morning in January, the prison-gates were thrown open to Désiré Baudru.

At first, he seemed rather embarrassed and walked like a man who has no very precise idea as to how to employ his time. He went down the Rue de la Santé and the Rue Saint-Jacques. Stopping outside an old clothes-shop, he took off his jacket and waistcoat, sold his waistcoat for a few sous, put on his jacket again and went on.

He crossed the Seine. At the Châtelat, an omnibus passed him. He tried to get into it. It was full. The ticket-collector advised him to take a number. He entered the waiting-room.

Ganimard beckoned to his two men, and, keeping his eyes on the omnibus-office, said quickly :

"Stop a cab . . . no, two cabs, that's better. I'll take one of you with me. We'll follow him."

The men did as they were told. Baudru, however, did not appear. Ganimard went into the waiting-room : there was no one there.

"What a fool I am!" he muttered. "I forgot the other door."

The booking-office, as a matter of fact, is connected with the other in the Rue Saint-Martin. Ganimard rushed through the communicating passage. He was just in time to catch sight of Baudru on the top of an omnibus from Batignolles to the Jardin des Plantes, which was turning the corner of the Rue de Rivoli. He ran after the omnibus and caught it up. But he had lost his two assistants and was continuing the pursuit alone.

In his rage, he felt like taking Baudru by the collar, without further form of ceremony. Was it not by premeditation and thanks to an ingenious trick that the so-called idiot had separated him from his two auxiliaries? He looked at Baudru. The man was dozing where he sat and his head swayed from right to left. His mouth was half-open, his face wore an incredible expression of stupidity. No, this was not an adversary capable of taking in old Ganimard : chance had favoured him; that was all.

At the Carrefour des Galeries-Lafayette, Baudru changed from the omnibus to the La Muette tram. Ganimard followed his example. They went along the Boulevard Haussmann and the Avenue Victor-Hugo. Baudru alighted at the La Muette stopping-place and, with a careless step, entered the Bois de Boulogne.

He passed from one alley to the other, retraced his steps and went on again. What was he looking for? Had he an object in view?

After an hour of these manœuvres, he seemed tired and worn out. Catching sight of a bench, he sat down upon it. The spot was not far from Auteuil, on the brink of a little lake hidden among the trees, and was absolutely deserted. Half an hour elapsed. At last, losing patience, Ganimard resolved to enter into conversation.

He therefore went up and took a seat by Baudru's side. He lit a cigarette, drew a pattern in the sand with the point of his stick and said:

"A cold day."

Silence. And, suddenly, in this silence, a peal of laughter rang out, a peal of glad and happy laughter, the laughter of a child seized with a fit of laughter and utterly unable to keep from laughing, laughing, laughing. Ganimard felt his hair literally and positively stand on end on his head. That laugh, that infernal laugh, which he knew so well! . . .

With an abrupt movement, he caught the man by the lapels of his jacket and gave him a violent and penetrating look, scrutinised him even more closely than he had done at the criminal court; and, in truth, it was no longer the man he had seen. It was the man, but, at the same time, it was the other, the real man.

Aided by the wish which is father to the thought, he rediscovered the glowing light in the eyes, he filled in the sunken features, he saw the real flesh under the wizened skin, the real mouth through the grimace which deformed it. And it was the other's eyes, it was the other's mouth, it was, above all, his keen, lively, mocking, witty expression, so bright and so young!

"Arsène Lupin, Arsène Lupin!" he stammered.

And, in the sudden access of rage, he caught him by the throat and tried to throw him down. Notwithstanding his fifty years, he was still a man of uncommon vigour, whereas his adversary seemed quite out of condition. And what a master-stroke it would be if he succeeded in bringing him back!

The struggle was short. Arsène Lupin hardly moved a limb in self-defence and Ganimard let go as promptly as he had attacked. His right arm hung, numbed and lifeless, by his side.

"If they taught you jiu-jitsu at the Quai des Orfèvres," said Lupin, "you would know that they call this movement udi-shi-ghi in Japanese." And he added, coldly, "Another second and I should have broken your arm; and you would have had no more than you deserve. What! You, an old friend, whom I esteem, before whom I reveal my incognito of my own accord, would you abuse my confidence? It's very wrong of you! . . . Hullo, what's the matter now?"

Ganimard was silent. This escape, for which he held himself responsible—was it not he who, by his sensational evidence, had diverted the ends of justice?—this escape seemed to him to mark the disgrace of his career. A tear trickled slowly down his cheek towards his grey moustache.

"Why, goodness me, Ganimard, don't take on like that! If you hadn't spoken, I should have arranged for someone else to speak. Come, come, how could I have allowed them to find a verdict against Désiré Baudru?"

"So it was you that were there?" muttered Ganimard. "And it's you that are here?"

"Yes, I, I, no one but me."

"Is it possible?"

"Oh, one needn't be a wizard for that. It is enough, as that worthy judge said, to prepare one's self for a dozen years or so in order to be ready for every eventuality."

"But your face? Your eyes?"

"You can understand that, when I worked for eighteen months at St. Louis' with Dr. Altier, it was not for love of art. I felt that the man who would one day have the honour of calling himself Arsène Lupin should be exempt from the ordinary laws of personal appearance and identity. You can modify your appearance as you please. A hypodermic injection of paraffin puffs up your skin to just the extent desired. Pyrogallic acid turns you into a Cherokee Indian. Celandine juice adorns you with blotches and pimples of the most pleasing kind. A certain chemical process affects the growth of your hair and beard, another the sound of your voice. Add to that two months of dieting in Cell 24, constant practice in opening my mouth with this particular grimace and carrying my head at this angle and my back with this stoop. Lastly, five drops of atropine in the eyes to make them haggard and dilated and the trick is done!"

"I can't see how the warders . . ."

"The change was slow and progressive. They could never have noticed its daily evolution."

"But Désiré Baudru . . .?"

"Baudru is a real person. He is a poor, harmless beggar whom I met last year and whose features are really not quite unlike my own. Foreseeing an always possible arrest, I placed him in safe keeping and applied myself from the first to picking out the points of dissimilarity between us, so as to diminish these in myself as far as I could. My friends made him pass a night at the police-station, in such a way that he left it at about the same time as I did and that the coincidence could be easily established. For, observe, it was necessary that some trace of his passage should be found, else the authorities would have wanted to know who I was. Whereas, by suggesting that excellent Baudru, I made it inevitable—do you follow me?—inevitable that they should jump at him and in spite of the insurmountable difficulties of a substitution, prefer to believe in that substitution rather than admit their ignorance."

"Yes, yes, that's true," muttered Ganimard.

"And then," cried Arsène Lupin, "I held a formidable trump in my hand, a card which I had prepared from the start: the universal expectation of my escape. And there you see the clumsy mistake into which you and all of you fell, in this exciting game which the law and I were playing, with my liberty for the stakes: you once more thought that I was bragging, and I was intoxicated with my own successes, just like the veriest greenhorn. Fancy me, Arsène Lupin, guilty of such weakness! And, as in the Cahorn case, you again failed to say to yourselves, 'The moment Arsène Lupin proclaims from the house-tops that he means to escape, he must have some reason that obliges him to proclaim it.' But, hang it all, don't you see that, in order for me to escape . . . without escaping, it was essential that people should believe beforehand in my escape, that it should be an article of faith, an absolute conviction, a truth clear as daylight? And that is what it became, in accordance with my will. Arsène Lupin intended to escape. Arsène Lupin did not intend to be present at his trial. And, when you stood up and said, 'That man is not Arsène Lupin,' it would have been beyond human nature for all those present not at once to believe that I was not Arsène Lupin. Had but one person expressed a doubt, had but one person uttered this simple reservation, 'But suppose it is Arsène Lupin?' . . . that very moment I should have been lost. They had only to bend over and look at me, not with the idea that I was not Arsène Lupin, as you and the rest did, but with the idea that I might be Arsène Lupin, and, in spite of all my precautions, I should have been recognised. But I was quite easy in my mind. It was logically and psychologically impossible for anybody to have that simple little idea."

He suddenly seized Ganimard's hand:

"Look here, Ganimard, confess that a week after our interview at the Santé prison, you stayed in for me, at four o'clock, as I asked you to!"

"And your prison-van?" said Ganimard, evading the question.

"Bluff, mere bluff. My friends had faked up that old discarded van and substituted it for the other; and they wanted to try the experiment. But I knew that it was impracticable without the co-operation of exceptional circumstances. Only, I thought it useful to complete this attempted escape and to give it the proper publicity. A first escape, boldly planned, gave to the second the full value of an escape realised in advance."

"So the cigar . . ."

"Was scooped out by myself; and the knife too."

"And the notes?"

"Written by me."

"And the mysterious correspondent?"

"She and I were one. I can write any hand I please."

Ganimard thought for a moment and said:

"How was it that, when they took Baudru's measurements in the anthropometrical room, they were not found to agree with Arsène Lupin's?"

"Arsène Lupin's record does not exist."

"Nonsense!"

"Or, at least, it is not correct. This is a question to which I have devoted a good deal of study. The Bertillon system allows for, first, an ocular description—and you have seen that this is not infallible—and, next, a description by measurements: measurements of the head, the fingers, the ears and so on. There is nothing to be done against that."

"So . . .?"

"So I had to pay. Before my return from America, one of the clerks of the staff accepted a definite bribe to enter one false measurement at the start. This is enough to throw the whole system out of gear and to cause a record to stray into a compartment diametrically opposite to the compartment in which it ought to go. The Baudru record could not, therefore, possibly agree with the Arsène Lupin record."

There was another silence and then Ganimard asked:

"And what are you going to do now?"

"Now?" exclaimed Lupin. "I am going to take a rest, feed myself up and gradually become myself again. It's all very well to be Baudru or another, to change your personality as you would your boots and to select your appearance, your voice, your expression, your handwriting. But there comes a time when you cease to know yourself amid all these changes; and that is very sad. I feel at present as the man must have felt who lost his shadow. I am going to look for myself . . . and to find myself."

He walked up and down. The daylight was waning. He stopped in front of Ganimard:

"We've said all that we had to say to each other, I suppose?"

"No," replied the Inspector. "I should like to know if you intend to publish the truth about your escape . . . and the mistake I made . . ."

"Oh, no one will ever know that it was Arsène Lupin that was released. I have far too great an interest to serve in heaping up the most mysterious darkness around me that I should dream of depriving my flight of its almost miraculous character. So have no fear, my dear friend; and good-bye. I am dining out to-night and have only just time to dress."

"I thought you were so anxious for a rest."

"Alas, there are social engagements from which it is impossible to escape. My rest must begin to-morrow."

"And where are you dining, may I ask?"

"At the British Embassy."

THE MYSTERIOUS RAILWAY-PASSENGER

THE MYSTERIOUS RAILWAY-PASSENGER

I HAD sent my motor-car to Rouen, by road, on the previous day. I was to meet it by train and go on to some friends who have a house on the Seine.

A few minutes before we left Paris, my compartment was invaded by seven gentlemen, five of whom were smoking. Short though the journey by the fast train be, I did not relish the prospect of taking it in such company, the more so as the old-fashioned carriage had no corridor. I therefore collected my overcoat, my newspapers and my railway-guide and sought refuge in one of the neighbouring compartments

It was occupied by a lady. At the sight of me, she made a movement of vexation which did not escape my notice and leant towards a gentleman standing on the footboard: her husband, no doubt, who had come to see her off. The gentleman took stock of me and the examination seemed to conclude to my advantage, for he whispered to his wife and smiled, giving her the look with which we reassure a frightened child. She smiled, in her turn, and cast a friendly glance in my direction, as though she suddenly realised that I was one of those decent men with whom a woman can remain locked up for an hour or two, in a little box six feet square, without having anything to fear.

Her husband said to her:

"You mustn't mind, darling, but I have an important appointment and I can't wait."

He kissed her affectionately and went away. His wife blew him some discreet little kisses through the window and waved her handkerchief.

Then the guard's whistle sounded and the train started.

At that moment and in spite of the warning shouts of the railway-officials, the door opened and a man burst into our carriage. My travelling-companion, who ~~was~~ standing up and arranging her things in the rack, uttered a cry of terror and dropped down upon the seat.

I am no coward, far from it, but I confess that these sudden incursions at the last minute are always annoying. They seem ~~so~~ ambiguous, so unnatural. There must be something behind them, else . . .

The appearance and bearing of the newcomer, however, were such as to correct the bad impression produced by the manner of his entrance. He was neatly, almost smartly dressed; his tie was in good taste, his gloves clean; he had a powerful face . . . But, speaking of his face, where on earth had I seen it before? For I had seen it: of that there ~~was~~ no doubt. Or, at least to be accurate, I found within myself that sort of recollection which is left by the sight of an oft-seen portrait of which one has never beheld the original. And at the same time, I felt the uselessness of any effort of memory that I might exert, so inconsistent and vague ~~was~~ that recollection.

But, when my eyes reverted to the lady, I sat astounded at the pallor and disorder of her features. She was staring at her neighbour—he was seated on the same side of the carriage—with an expression of genuine affright; and I ~~saw~~ one of her hands steal trembling towards a little wrist-bag that lay on the cushion a few inches from her lap. She ended by taking hold of it and nervously drawing it to her.

Our eyes met and I read in hers ~~so~~ great an amount of uneasiness and anxiety that I could not help saying:

“I hope you are not unwell, madame? . . . Shall I open the window?”

She made no reply, but, with a timid gesture, called my attention to the man. I smiled as her husband had done, shrugged my shoulders, and explained to her by signs that she had no cause for alarm, that I was there and that, besides, the gentleman seemed quite harmless.

Just then, he turned towards us, and after contemplating us, one after the other, from head to foot, huddled himself into his corner and made no further movement.

A silence ensued; but the lady, as though summoning all her energies to perform an act of despair, said to me, in a hardly intelligible tone :

“You know he is in our train?”

“Who?”

“Why, he . . . he himself . . . I assure you.”

“Whom do you mean?”

“Arsène Lupin!”

She had not removed her eyes from the passenger; and it was at him rather than at me that she flung the syllables of that dread name.

He pulled his hat down upon his nose. Was this to conceal his agitation, or was he merely preparing to go to sleep?

I objected :

“Arsène Lupin was sentenced yesterday, in his absence, to twenty years’ penal servitude. It is not likely that he would commit the imprudence of showing himself in public to-day. Besides, the newspapers have discovered that he has been spending the winter in Turkey, ever since his famous escape from the Santé.”

“He is in this train,” repeated the lady, with the more and more marked intention of being overheard by our companion. “My husband is a deputy prison-governor, and the station-inspector himself told us that they were looking for Arsène Lupin.”

“That is no reason why . . .”

“He was seen at the booking-office. He took a ticket for Rouen.”

“It would have been easy to lay hands upon him.”

“He disappeared. The ticket-collector at the door of the waiting-room did not see him; but they thought that he must have gone round by the suburban platforms and stepped into the express that leaves ten minutes after us.”

“In that case, they will have caught him there.”

“And supposing that, at the last moment, he jumped out of the express and entered this, our own train . . . as he probably . . . as he most certainly did?"

"In that case, they will catch him here. For the porters and the police cannot have failed to see him going from one train to the other and, when we reach Rouen, they will nab him finely."

"Him? Never! He will find some means of escaping again."

"In that case, I wish him a good journey."

"But think of all that he may do in the meantime!"

"What?"

"How can I tell? One must be prepared for anything."

She was greatly agitated; and, in point of fact, the situation, to a certain degree, warranted her nervous state of excitement. Almost in spite of myself, I said:

"There are such things as curious coincidences, it is true . . . But calm yourself. Admitting that Arsène Lupin is in one of these carriages, he is sure to keep quiet and, rather than bring fresh trouble upon himself, he will have no other idea than to avoid the danger that threatens him."

My words failed to reassure her. However, she said no more, fearing, no doubt, lest I should think her troublesome.

As for myself, I opened my newspapers and read the reports of Arsène Lupin's trial. They contained nothing that was not already known and they interested me but slightly. Moreover, I was tired, I had had a poor night, I felt my eyelids growing heavy and my head began to nod.

"But, surely, sir, you are not going to sleep!"

The lady snatched my paper from my hands and looked at me with indignation.

"Certainly not," I replied. "I have no wish to."

"It would be most imprudent," she said.

"Most," I repeated.

And I struggled hard, fixing my eyes on the landscape, on the clouds that streaked the sky. And soon all this became confused in space, the picture of the excited lady and the drowsy man was obliterated from my mind and I was filled with a great, deep silence of sleep.

It was soon made agreeable by light and incoherent dreams, in which a being who played the part and bore the name of Arsène Lupin occupied a certain place. He turned and shifted on the horizon, his back laden with valuables, clambering over walls and stripping country-houses of their contents.

But the outline of this being, who had ceased to be Arsène Lupin, grew more distinct. He came towards me, grew bigger and bigger, leapt into the carriage with incredible agility and fell full upon my chest.

A sharp pain . . . a piercing scream . . . I awoke. The man, my fellow-traveller, with one knee on my chest, was clutching my throat.

I saw this very dimly, for my eyes were shot with blood. I also saw the lady, in a corner, writhing in a violent fit of hysterics. I did not even attempt to resist. I should not have had the strength for it, had I wished to: my temples were throbbing, I choked . . . my throat rattled . . . Another minute . . . and I should have been suffocated.

The man must have felt this. He loosened his grip. Without leaving hold of me, with his right hand he stretched a rope, in which he had prepared a slip-knot, and, with a quick turn, tied my wrists together. In a moment, I was bound, gagged, rendered motionless and helpless.

And he performed this task in the most natural manner in the world, with an ease that revealed the knowledge of a master, of an expert in theft and crime. Not a word, not a fevered movement. Sheer coolness and audacity. And there was I on the seat, tied up like a mummy, I, Arsène Lupin!

It was really ridiculous. And, notwithstanding the seriousness of the circumstances, I could not but appreciate and almost enjoy the irony of the situation. Arsène Lupin "done" like a novice! Stripped like the first-comer—for of course the scoundrel relieved me of my pocket-book and purse! Arsène Lupin victimised in his turn, duped, defeated! What an adventure!

There remained the lady. He took no notice of her at all. He contented himself with picking up the wrist-bag that lay on the floor and extracting the jewels, the purse, the gold and silver knick-knacks which it contained. The lady opened her eyes, shuddered with fright, took off her rings and handed them to the man, as though she wished to spare him any superfluous exertion. He took the rings and looked at her : she fainted away.

Then, calm and silent as before, without troubling about us further, he resumed his seat, lit a cigarette, and abandoned himself to a careful scrutiny of the treasures which he had captured, the inspection of which seemed to satisfy him completely.

I was much less satisfied. I am not speaking of the twelve thousand francs of which I had been unduly plundered : this was a loss which I accepted only for the time; I had no doubt that those twelve thousand francs would return to my possession after a short interval, together with the exceedingly important papers which my pocket-book contained : plans, estimates, specifications, addresses, lists of correspondents, letters of a compromising character. But, for the moment, a more immediate and serious care was worrying me : what was to happen next?

As may be readily imagined, the excitement caused by my passing through the Gare Saint-Lazare had not escaped me. As I was going to stay with friends who knew me by the name of Guillaume Berlat and to whom my resemblance to Arsène Lupin was the occasion of many a friendly jest, I had not been able to disguise myself after my wont and my presence had been discovered. Moreover, a man, doubtless Arsène Lupin, had been seen to rush from the express into the other train. Hence it was inevitable and fated that the commissary of police at Rouen, warned by telegram, would await the arrival of the train, assisted by a respectable number of constables, question any suspicious passengers and proceed to make a minute inspection of the carriages.

All this I had foreseen and had not felt greatly excited about it; for I was certain that the Rouen police would display no greater perspicacity than the Paris police and that I should have been able to pass unperceived : was it not sufficient for me, at the wicket, carelessly to show my deputy's card, thanks to which I had already inspired the ticket-collector at Saint-Lazare with every confidence? But how things had changed since then! I was no longer free. It was impossible to attempt one of my usual moves. In one of the carriages the commissary would discover the Sieur Arsène Lupin, whom a propitious fate was sending to him bound hand and foot, gentle as a lamb, packed up complete. He had only to accept delivery, just as you receive a parcel addressed to you at a railway-station, a hamper of game or a basket of vegetables and fruit.

And to avoid this annoying catastrophe what could I do, entangled as I was in my bonds?

And the train was speeding towards Rouen, the next and only stopping place; it rushed through Vernon, through Saint-Pierre . . .

I was puzzled also by another problem, in which I was not so directly interested, but the solution of which aroused my professional curiosity. What were my fellow-traveller's intentions?

If I had been alone, he would have had ample time to alight quite calmly at Rouen. But the lady? As soon as the carriage-door was opened, the lady, meek and quiet as she sat at present, would scream and throw herself about and cry for assistance!

Hence my astonishment. Why did he not reduce her to the same state of helplessness as myself, which would have given him time to disappear before his two-fold misdemeanour was discovered?

He was still smoking, his eyes fixed on the view outside, which a hesitating rain was beginning to streak with long, slanting lines. Once, however, he turned round, took up my railway-guide and consulted it.

As for the lady, she made every effort to continue fainting, so as to quiet her enemy. But a fit of coughing, produced by the smoke, gave the lie to her pretended swoon.

Myself, I was very uncomfortable and had pains all over my body. And I thought . . . I planned . . .

Pont-de-l'Arche . . . Oissell . . . The train was hurrying on, glad drunk with speed . . . Saint-Étienne. . . .

At that moment, the man rose and took two steps towards us, to which the lady hastened to reply with a new scream and a genuine fainting-fit.

But what could his object be? He lowered the window on our side. The rain was now falling in torrents and he made a movement of annoyance at having neither umbrella nor overcoat. He looked up at the rack : the lady's en-tout-cas was there; he took it. He also took my overcoat and put it on.

We were crossing the Seine. He turned up his trousers and then, leaning out of the window, raised the outer latch.

Did he mean to fling himself on the permanent way? At the rate at which we were going, it would have been certain death. We plunged into the tunnel through the Côte Sainte-Catherine. The man opened the door and, with one foot, felt for the step. What madness! The darkness, the smoke, the din all combined to lend a fantastic appearance to any such attempt. But, suddenly, the train slowed up, the Westinghouse brakes counteracted the movement of the wheels. In a minute, the pace from fast became normal and decreased still more. Without a doubt, there was a gang at work repairing this part of the tunnel; this would necessitate a slower passage of the trains, for some days perhaps; and the man knew it.

He had only, therefore, to put his other foot on the step, climb down to the footboard and walk quietly away, not without first closing the door and throwing back the latch.

He had scarcely disappeared when the smoke showed whiter in the daylight. We emerged into a valley. One more tunnel and we should be at Rouen.

The lady at once recovered her wits and her first care was to bewail the loss of her jewels. I gave her a beseeching glance. She understood and relieved me of the gag which was stifling me. She wanted also to unfasten my bonds, but I stopped her :

"No, no : the police must see everything as it was. I want them to be fully informed as regards that blackguard's actions."

"Shall I pull the alarm signal?"

"Too late : you should have thought of that while he was attacking me."

"But he would have killed me! Ah, sir, didn't I tell you that he was travelling by this train? I knew him at once, by his portrait. And now he's taken my jewels."

"They'll catch him have no fear."

"Catch Arsène Lupin! Never."

"It all depends on you, madame. Listen. When we arrive, be at the window, call out, make a noise. The police and porters will come up. Tell them what you have seen, in a few words: the assault of which I was the victim and the flight of Arsène Lupin. Give his description : a soft hat, an umbrella—yours—a grey frock overcoat . . ."

"Yours," she said.

"Mine? No, his own. I didn't have one."

"I thought that he had none either when he got in."

"He must have had . . . unless it was a coat which some one had left behind in the rack. In any case, he had it when he got out and that is the essential thing. . . . A grey frock overcoat, remember. . . . Oh, I was forgetting . . . tell them your name to start with. Your husband's position will stimulate their zeal."

We were arriving. She was already leaning out of the window. I resumed, in a louder, almost imperious voice, so that my words should sink into her brain :

"Give my name also, Guillaume Berlat. If necessary, say you know me. . . . That will save time . . . we must hurry on the preliminary inquiries . . . the important thing is to catch Arsène Lupin . . . with your jewels . . . You quite understand, don't you? Guillaume Berlat, a friend of your husband's."

"Quite . . . Guillaume Berlat."

She was already calling out and gesticulating. Before the train had come to a standstill, a gentleman climbed in, followed by a number of other men. The critical hour was at hand.

Breathlessly, the lady exclaimed :

"Arsène Lupin . . . he attacked us . . . he has stolen my jewels . . . I am Madame Renaud . . . my husband is a deputy prison governor . . . Ah, here is my brother Georges Andelle, manager of the Crédit Rouennais . . . What I want to say is . . ."

She kissed a young man who had just come up and who exchanged greetings with the commissary of police. She continued, weeping :

"Yes, Arsène Lupin. . . . He flew at this gentleman's throat in his sleep. . . . Monsieur Berlat, a friend of my husband's."

"But where is Arsène Lupin?"

"He jumped out of the train in the tunnel, after we had crossed the Seine."

"Are you sure it was he?"

"Certain; I recognised him at once. Besides, he was seen at the Gare Saint-Lazare. He was wearing a soft hat . . ."

"No, a hard felt hat, like this," said the commissary, pointing to my hat.

"A soft hat, I assure you," repeated Madame Renaud, "and a grey frock overcoat."

"Yes," muttered the commissary, "the telegram mentions a grey frock overcoat with a black velvet collar."

"A black velvet collar, that's it!" exclaimed Madame Renaud, triumphantly.

I breathed again. What a good, excellent friend I had found in her!

Meanwhile, the policeman had released me from my bonds. I bit my lips violently till the blood flowed. Bent in two, with my handkerchief to my mouth, as seems proper to a man who has long been sitting in a constrained position and who bears on his face the blood-stained marks of the gag, I said to the commissary, in a feeble voice :

"Sir, it was Arsène Lupin, there is no doubt of it. . . . You can catch him, if you hurry. . . . I think I may be of some use to you. . . ."

The coach, which was needed for the inspection by the police, was slipped. The remainder of the train went on to Le Havre. We were taken to the station-master's office through a crowd of onlookers who filled the platform.

Just then, I felt a hesitation. I must make some excuse to absent myself, find my motor-car and be off. It was dangerous to wait. If anything happened, if a telegram came from Paris, I was lost.

Yes, but what about my robber? Left to my own resources, in a district with which I was not very familiar, I could never hope to come up with him.

"Bah!" I said to myself. "Let us risk it and stay. It's a difficult hand to win, but a very amusing one to play. And the stakes are worth the trouble."

And, as we were being asked provisionally to repeat our depositions, I exclaimed:

"Mr. Commissary, Arsène Lupin is at this moment getting a start of us. My motor is waiting for me in the station-yard. If you will do me the pleasure to accept a seat in it, we will try . . ."

The commissary gave a knowing smile:

"It's not a bad idea . . . such a good idea, in fact, that it's already being carried out."

"Oh?"

"Yes; two of my officers started on bicycles . . . some time ago."

"But where to?"

"To the entrance to the tunnel. There they will pick up the clues and the evidence and follow the track of Arsène Lupin."

I could not help shrugging my shoulders:

"Your two officers will pick up no clues and no evidence."

"Really!"

"Arsène Lupin will have arranged that no one should see him leave the tunnel. He will have taken the nearest road and, from there . . ."

"From there made for Rouen, where we shall catch him."

"He will not go to Rouen."

"In that case, he will remain in the neighbourhood, where we shall be even more certain . . ."

"He will not remain in the neighbourhood."

"Oh? Then where will he hide himself?"

I took out my watch:

"At the present moment Arsène Lupin is hanging about the station at Darnétal. At ten-fifty, that is to say, in twenty-two minutes from now, he will take the train which leaves Rouen, from the Gare du Nord, for Amiens."

"Do you think so? And how do you know?"

"Oh, it's very simple. In the carriage, Arsène Lupin consulted my railway-guide. What for? To see if there was another line near the place where he disappeared, a station on that line and a train which stopped at that station. I have just looked at the guide myself and learnt what I wanted to know."

"Upon my word, sir," said the commissary, "you possess marvellous powers of deduction. What an expert you must be!"

Dragged on by my conviction, I had blundered into displaying too much cleverness. He looked at me in astonishment and I saw that a suspicion flickered through his mind. Only just, it is true, for the photographs dispatched in every direction were so unlike, represented an Arsène Lupin so different from the one that stood before him, that he could not possibly recognise the original in me. Nevertheless, he was troubled, restless, perplexed.

There was a moment of silence. A certain ambiguity and doubt seemed to interrupt our words. A shudder of anxiety passed through me. Was luck about to turn against me? Mastering myself, I began to laugh:

"Ah, well, there's nothing to sharpen one's wits like the loss of a pocket-book and the desire to find it again. And it seems to me, that, if you will give me two of your men, the three of us might, perhaps . . ."

"Oh, please, Mr. Commissary," exclaimed Madame Renaud, "do what Monsieur Berlat suggests."

My kind friend's intervention turned the scale. Uttered by her, the wife of ~~an~~ influential person, the name of Berlat became mine in reality and conferred upon me an identity which no suspicion could touch. The commissary rose :

“Believe me, Monsieur Berlat, I shall be only too pleased to see you succeed. I am as anxious ~~as~~ yourself to have Arsène Lupin arrested.”

He escorted me to my car. He introduced two of his men to me : Honoré Massol and Gaston Delivet. They took their seats. I placed myself at the wheel. My chauffeur started the engine. A few seconds later we had left the station. I was saved.

I confess that, as we dashed in my powerful 35-h.p. Moreau-Lepton along the boulevards that skirt the old Norman city, I was not without a certain sense of pride. The engine hummed harmoniously. The trees sped behind us to right and left. And now, free and out of danger, I had nothing to do but to settle my little private affairs, with the co-operation of those two worthy representatives of the law. Arsène Lupin was going in search of Arsène Lupin.

Ye humble mainstays of the social order of things, Gaston Delivet and Honoré Massol, how precious ~~was~~ your assistance to me ! Where should I have been without you ? But for you, at how many cross-roads should I have taken the wrong turning ! But for you, Arsène Lupin would have gone astray and the other escaped !

But all was not over yet. Far from it. I had first to capture the fellow and next to take possession, myself, of the papers of which he had robbed me. At ~~no~~ cost must my two satellites be allowed to catch a sight of those documents, much less lay hands upon them. To make use of them and yet act independently of them was what I wanted to do ; and it was no easy matter.

We reached Darnétal three minutes after the train had left. I had the consolation of learning that a man in a grey frock overcoat with a black velvet collar had got into a second-class carriage, with a ticket for Amiens. There was no doubt about it : my first appearance as a detective was ~~a~~ promising one.

Delivet said :

“The train is an express and does not stop before Montérolier-Buchy, in nineteen minutes from now. If we are not there before Arsène Lupin, he can go on towards Amiens, branch off to Clères, and, from there, make for Dieppe or Paris."

"How far is Montérolier?"

"Fourteen miles and a half."

"Fourteen miles and a half in nineteen minutes . . . We shall be there before him."

It was a stirring race. Never had my trusty Moreau-Lepton responded to my impatience with greater ardour and regularity. It seemed to me as though I communicated my wishes to her directly, without the intermediary of levers or handles. She shared my desires. She approved of my determination. She understood my animosity against that black-guard Arsène Lupin. The scoundrel! The sneak! Should I get the better of him? Or would he once more baffle authority, that authority of which I was the embodiment?

"Right!" cried Delivet. . . . "Left! . . . Straight ahead! . . ."

We skimmed the ground. The milestones looked like little timid animals, that fled at our approach.

And suddenly, at the turn of a road, a cloud of smoke, the north express!

For half a mile, it was a struggle, side by side, an unequal struggle, of which the issue was certain. We beat the train by twenty lengths.

In three seconds we were on the platform, in front of the second-class. The doors were flung open. A few people stepped out. My thief was not among them. We examined the carriages. No Arsène Lupin.

"By jove!" I exclaimed. "He must have recognised me in the motor, while we were going alongside, and jumped out!"

The guard of the train confirmed my supposition. He had seen a man scrambling down the embankment, at two hundred yards from the station:

"There he is! . . . Look! . . . At the level crossing!"

I darted in pursuit, followed by my two satellites, or rather by one of them, for the other, Massol, turned out to be an uncommonly fast sprinter, gifted with both speed and staying power. In a few seconds, the distance between him and the fugitive was greatly diminished. The man saw him, jumped a hedge and scampered off towards a slope, which he climbed. We saw him farther still, entering a little wood.

When we reached the wood, we found Massol waiting for us. He had thought it wiser not to go on, lest he should lose us.

"You were quite right, my dear fellow," I said. "After a run like this, our friend must be exhausted. We've got him."

I examined the skirts of the wood, while thinking how I could best proceed alone to arrest the fugitive, in order myself to effect certain recoveries which the law, no doubt, would only have allowed after a number of disagreeable inquiries. Then I returned to my companions :

"Look here, it's quite easy. You, Massol, take up your position on the left : You, Delivet, on the right. From there, you can watch the whole rear of the wood and he can't leave it, unseen by you, except by this hollow way, where I shall stand. If he does not come out, I'll go in and force him back towards one or the other. You have nothing to do, therefore, but wait. Oh, I was forgetting : in case of alarm, I'll fire a shot."

Massol and Delivet moved off, each to his own side. As soon as they were out of sight, I made my way into the wood, with infinite precautions, so as to be neither seen nor heard. It consisted of close thickets, contrived for the shooting, and intersected by very narrow paths, in which it was only possible to walk by stooping, as though in a leafy tunnel.

One of these ended in a glade where the damp grass showed the marks of footsteps. I followed them, taking care to steal through the underwood. They led me to the bottom of a little mound, crowned by a rickety lath-and-plaster hovel.

"He must be there," I thought. "He has chosen a good post of observation."

I crawled close up to the building. A slight sound warned me of his presence and, in fact, I caught sight of him through an opening, with his back turned towards me.

Two bounds brought me upon him. He tried to point the revolver which he held in his hand. I did not give him time, but pulled him to the ground, in such a way that his two arms were twisted and caught under him, while I held him pinned down with my knee upon his chest :

"Listen to me, old chap," I whispered in his ear. "I am Arsène Lupin. You've got to give me back my pocket-book and the lady's wrist-bag, this minute and without fuss . . . in return for which I'll save you from the clutches of the police and enrol you among my pals. Which is it to be : yes or no?"

"Yes," he muttered.

"That's right. Your plan of this morning was cleverly thought out. We shall be good friends."

I got up. He fumbled in his pocket, fetched out a great knife, and tried to strike me with it.

"You ass!" I cried.

With one hand I parried the attack. With the other, I caught him a violent blow on the carotid artery, the blow which is known as "the carotid hook". He fell back stunned.

In my pocket-book, I found my papers and bank-notes. I took his own out of curiosity. On an envelope addressed to him I read his name : Pierre Onfrey.

I gave a start. Pierre Onfrey, the perpetrator of the murder in the Rue Lafontaine at Auteuil! Pierre Onfrey, the man who had cut the throats of Madame Delbois and her two daughters! I bent over him. Yes, that was the face which, in the railway-carriage, had aroused in me the memory of features which I had seen before.

But time ~~was~~ passing. I placed two hundred-franc notes in an envelope, with a visiting-card bearing these words :

"Arsène Lupin to his worthy assistants, Honoré Massol and Gaston Delivet, with his best thanks."

I laid this where it could be seen, in the middle of the room. Beside it, I placed Madame Renaud's wrist-bag. Why should it not be restored to the kind friend who had rescued me? I confess, however that I took from it everything that seemed in any way interesting, leaving only a tortoise-shell comb, a stick of lip-salve, and an empty purse. Business is business, when all is said and done! And, besides, her husband followed such a disreputable occupation! . . .

There remained the man. He was beginning to move. What was I to do? I was not qualified either to save or to condemn him.

I took away his weapons and fired my revolver in the air :

"That will bring the two others," I thought. "He must find a way out of his difficulties. Let fate take its course."

And I went down the hollow way at a run.

Twenty minutes later, a cross-road, which I had noticed during our pursuit, brought me back to my car.

At four o'clock, I telegraphed to my friends from Rouen that an unexpected incident compelled me to put off my visit. Between ourselves, I greatly fear that, in view of what they must now have learned, I shall be obliged to postpone it indefinitely. It will be a cruel disappointment for them!

At six o'clock, I returned to Paris by L'Isle-Adam, Enghien and the Porte Bineau.

I gathered from the evening papers that the police had at last succeeded in capturing Pierre Onfrey.

The next morning—why should we despise the advantages of intelligent advertisement?—The Echo de France contained the following sensational paragraph :

"Yesterday, near Buchy, after a number of incidents, Arsène Lupin effected the arrest of Pierre Onfrey. The Auteuil murderer had robbed a lady of the name of Renaud, the wife of the deputy prison-governor, in the train between Paris and Le Havre. Arsène Lupin has restored to Madame Renaud the wrist-bag which contained her jewels and has generously rewarded the two detectives who assisted him in the matter of this dramatic arrest."

THE QUEEN'S NECKLACE

THE QUEEN'S NECKLACE

Two or three times a year, on the occasion of important functions, such as the balls at the Austrian Embassy or Lady Billingsstone's receptions, the Comtesse de Dreux-Soubise would wear "the Queen's Necklace".

This was really the famous necklace, the historic necklace which Böhmer and Bassenge, the royal jewellers had designed for the Du Barry, which the Cardinal de Rohan-Soubise believed himself to be presenting to Queen Marie-Antoinette and which Jeanne de Valois, Comtesse de la Motte, the adventuress, took to pieces, one evening in February, 1785, with the assistance of her husband and their accomplice, Rétaux de Villette.

As a matter of fact, the setting alone was genuine. Rétaux de Villette had preserved it, while the Sieur de la Motte and his wife dispersed to the four winds of heaven the stones so brutally unmounted, the admirable stones once so carefully chosen by Böhmer. Later, Rétaux sold it, in Italy, to Gaston de Dreux-Soubise, the cardinal's nephew and heir, who had been saved by his uncle at the time of the notorious bankruptcy of the Rohan-Guéménée family and who, in grateful memory of this kindness, bought up the few diamonds that remained in the possession of Jeffreys, the English jeweller, completing them with others of much smaller value, but of identical dimensions, and thus succeeded in re-constructing the wonderful necklace in the form in which it had left Böhmer and Bassenge's hands.

The Dreux-Soubises had plumed themselves upon the possession of this ornament for nearly a century. Although their fortune had been considerably diminished by various circumstances, they preferred to reduce their establishment rather than part with the precious royal relic. The reigning count in particular clung to it as a man clings to the home of his fathers. For prudence' sake, he hired a safe at the Crédit Lyonnais in which to keep it. He always fetched thence himself on the afternoon of any day on which his wife proposed to wear it, and he as regularly took it back the next morning.

That evening, at the Palais de Castille, then still occupied by Isabella II, of Spain, the countess had a great success; and King Christian of Denmark, in whose honour the reception was given, remarked upon her magnificent beauty. The gems streamed round her slender neck. The thousand facets of the diamonds shone and sparkled like flames in the light of the brilliantly-illuminated rooms. None but she could have carried with such ease and dignity the burden of that wonderful ornament.

It was a two-fold triumph, which the Comte de Dreux enjoyed most thoroughly and upon which he congratulated himself when they returned to their bedroom in the old house in the Faubourg Saint-Germain. He was proud of his wife and quite as proud, perhaps, of the gaud which had shed its lustre upon his family for four generations. And the countess, too, derived from it a vanity which was a little childish, perhaps, and yet not out of keeping with her haughty character.

She took the necklace from her shoulders, not without regret, and handed it to her husband, who examined it with admiring eyes, as though he had never seen it before. Then, after replacing it in its red-morocco case, stamped with the cardinal's arms, he went into an adjoining linen-closet, originally a sort of alcove, which had been cut off from the room and which had only one entrance, a door at the foot of the bed. He hid the case, as was his custom, among the band-boxes and stacks of linen on one of the upper shelves. He returned, closed the door behind him, and undressed himself.

In the morning, he rose at nine o'clock, with the intention of going to the Crédit Lyonnais before lunch. He dressed, drank his coffee, and went down to the stables, where he gave his orders for the day. One of the horses seemed out of condition. He made the groom walk and trot it up and down before him in the yard. Then he went back to his wife.

She had not left the room and ~~was~~ having her hair dressed by her maid. She said :

“Are you going out?”

“Yes, to take it back . . .”

“Oh, of course, yes, that will be safest. . . .”

He entered the linen-closet. But, in a few seconds, he asked, without, however displaying any astonishment or alarm :

“Have you taken it, dear?”

She replied :

“What do you mean? No; I’ve taken nothing.”

“But you’ve moved it.”

“Not at all. . . . I haven’t even opened the door.”

He appeared in the doorway, with a bewildered air, and stammered, in hardly intelligible accents :

“You haven’t . . . ? You didn’t . . . ? But then . . .”

She ran to join him and together they made a feverish search, throwing the bandboxes to the floor and demolishing the stacks of linen. And the count kept on saying :

“It’s useless. . . . All that we are doing is quite useless. . . . I put it up here, on this shelf.”

“You may have forgotten.”

“No, no; it was here, on this shelf, and nowhere else.”

They lit a candle, for the light in the little room was bad, and removed all the linen and all the different things with which it ~~was~~ crowded. And, when the closet was quite empty, they were compelled to admit, in despair, that the famous necklace, the Queen’s Necklace, was gone.

The countess, who was noted for her determined character, wasted no time in vain lamentations, but sent for the commissary of police, M. Valorbe, whose sagacity and insight they had already had occasion to appreciate. He was put in possession of the details and his first question was :

“Are you sure, monsieur le comte, that no one can have passed through your room in the night?”

“Quite sure. I am a very light sleeper. And, besides, the bedroom door was bolted. I had to unfasten it this morning when my wife rang for the maid."

"Is there no other way through which the closet might be entered?"

"None."

"No window?"

"Yes, but it is blocked up."

"I should like to see it."

Candles were lit, and M. Valorbe at once remarked that the window was only blocked half-way, by a chest, which, besides, did not absolutely touch the casements.

"It is close enough up to prevent its being moved without making a great deal of noise."

"On what does the window look out?"

"A small inner yard."

"And you have another floor above this?"

"Two; but, at the level of the servants' floor, the yard is protected by a close-railed grating. That is what makes the light so bad."

Moreover, when they moved the chest, they found that the window was latched, which would have been impossible if anyone had entered from the outside.

"Unless," said the count, "he went out through our room."

"In which case you would not have found the door bolted in the morning."

The commissary reflected for a moment and then, turning to the countess, asked :

"Did your people know, madame, that you were going to wear the necklace last night?"

"Certainly; I made no mystery about it. But nobody knew that we put it away in the linen-closet."

"Nobody?"

"No . . . unless . . ."

"I must beg you, madame, to be exact. It is a most important point."

She said to her husband :

"I was thinking of Henriette."

"Henriette? She knew no more about it than the others."

"Are you sure?"

"Who is this lady?" asked M. Valorbe.

"One of my convent-friends, who quarrelled with her family and married a sort of workman. When her husband died, I took her in here, with her son, and furnished a couple of rooms for them in the house." And she added, with a certain confusion, "She does me a few little services. She is a very handy person."

"What floor does she live on?"

"On our own floor, not far off . . . at the end of the passage. . . . And, now that I think of it, her kitchen-window . . ."

"Looks out on this little yard, I suppose?"

"Yes, it is just opposite."

A short silence followed upon this statement.

Then M. Valorbe asked to be taken to Henriette's rooms.

They found her busy sewing, while her son Raoul, a little fellow of six or seven, sat reading beside her. Somewhat surprised at the sight of the wretched apartment which had been furnished for her and which consisted in all of one room, without a fireplace, and of a sort of recess or box-room that did duty for a kitchen, the commissary questioned her. She seemed much upset at hearing of the robbery. The night before, she had herself dressed the countess and fastened the necklace round her throat :

"Good gracious!" she exclaimed. "Who would ever have thought it?"

"And you have no idea, not the smallest inkling? You know, it is possible that the thief may have passed through your room."

She laughed whole-heartedly, as though not imagining for a moment that the least suspicion could rest upon her :

"Why, I never left my room! I never go out, you know. And besides, look!" She opened the window of the kitchen. "There! it's quite three yards to the ledge opposite."

"Who told you that we were considering the likelihood of a theft committed that way?"

"Why, wasn't the necklace in the closet?"

"How do you know?"

"Why, I always knew that they put it there at night . . . they used to talk of it before me . . ."

Her face which was still young, but scored by care and sorrow, showed great gentleness and resignation. Nevertheless, in the silence that ensued, it suddenly wore an expression of anguish, as though a danger had threatened its owner. Henriette drew her son to her. The child took her hand and kissed her fondly.

"I presume," said M. de Dreux to the commissary, when they were alone again, "I presume that you do not suspect her? I will answer for her. She is honesty itself."

"Oh, I am quite of your opinion," declared M. Valorbe. "At most, the thought of an unconscious complicity passed through my mind; but I can see that we must abandon this explanation . . . the more so as it does not in the least help to solve the problem that faces us."

The commissary did not push the enquiry any further. It was taken up by the examining magistrate and completed in the course of the days that followed. He questioned the servants, experimented on the way in which the window of the linen-closet opened and shut, explored the little inner yard from top to bottom. . . . It was all fruitless. The latch was untouched. The window could not be opened or closed from the outside.

The enquiries were aimed more particularly at Henriette, for, in spite of everything, the question always reverted in her direction. Her life was carefully investigated: it was ascertained that, in three years, she had only four times left the house; and it was possible to trace her movements on each of these occasions. As a matter of fact, she served Madame de Dreux in the capacity of lady's maid and dress-maker; and her mistress treated her with a strictness and severity to which all the servants, in confidence, bore witness.

"Besides," said the magistrate, who, by the end of the first week, had come to the same conclusions as the commissary, "supposing we knew the culprit—and we do not—we should be no wiser as to the manner in which the theft was committed. We are hemmed in on either side by two obstacles:

a locked window and a locked door. There are two mysteries: how was the thief able to get in; and, more difficult still, how was he able to get out and leave a bolted door and a latched window behind him?"

After four months' investigation, the magistrate's private impression was that M. and Madame de Dreux, driven by monetary needs, which were known to be considerable and pressing, had sold the Queen's Necklace. He filed the case and dismissed it from his mind.

• • • •

The theft of the priceless jewel struck the Dreux-Soubises a blow from which it took them long to recover. Now that their credit was no longer sustained by the sort of reserve-fund which the possession of that treasure constituted, they found themselves confronted with less reasonable creditors and less willing money-lenders. They were compelled to resort to energetic measures, to sell and mortgage their property. In short, it would have meant absolute ruin if two fat legacies from distant relatives had not come in the nick of time to save them.

They also suffered in their pride, as though they had lost one of the quarterings of their arms. And, strange to say, the countess wreaked her resentment upon her old school-friend. She bore her a real grudge and accused her openly. Henriette was first banished to the servants' floor and afterwards given a day's notice to quit.

The life of M. and Madame de Dreux passed without any event of note. They travelled a great deal.

One fact alone must be recorded as belonging to this period. A few months after Henriette's departure, the countess received a letter from her that filled her with amazement:

"MADAME,

"I do not know how to thank you. For it was you, was it not, who sent me that? It must have been you. No one else knows of my retreat in this little village. Forgive me if I am mistaken and, in any case, accept the expression of my gratitude for your past kindnesses."

What did she mean? The countess's past and present kindnesses to Henriette amounted to a number of acts of injustice. What ~~was~~ the meaning of these thanks?

Henriette was called upon to explain and replied that she had received by post, in an unregistered envelope, two notes of a thousand francs each. She enclosed the envelope in her letter. It was stamped with the Paris post-mark and bore only her address, written in an obviously disguised hand.

Where did that two thousand francs come from? Who had sent it? And why had it been sent? The police made enquiries. But what possible clue could they follow up in that darkness?

The same incident was repeated twelve months later. And a third time; and a fourth time; and every year for six years, with this difference, that in the fifth and sixth year, the amount sent was doubled, which enabled Henriette, who had suddenly fallen ill, to provide for proper nursing. There was another difference: the postal authorities having seized one of the letters, on the pretext that it was not registered, the two last letters were handed in for registration, one at Saint-Germain, the other at Suresnes. The sender had signed his name first as Anquety, next as Péchard. The addresses which he gave were false.

At the end of six years, Henriette died. The riddle remained unsolved.

All these particulars are matters of public knowledge. The case was one of those which stir men's minds; and it was strange that this necklace, after setting all France by the ears at the end of the eighteenth century, should succeed in causing so much renewed excitement more than a hundred years later. But what I am ~~now~~ about to relate is known to none, except the principals interested and a few persons upon whom the count imposed absolute secrecy. As it is probable that these will break their promise sooner or later, I have no scruple in tearing aside the veil; and thus my readers will receive, together with the key to the riddle, the explanation of the paragraph that appeared in the newspapers two mornings ago, an extraordinary paragraph, which added, if possible, a fresh modicum of darkness and mystery to the obscurity in which this drama was already shrouded.

We must go five days back. Among M. de Dreux-Soubise's guests at lunch were his two nieces and a cousin; the men were the Président d'Essaville, M. Bochas, the deputy, the Cavaliere Floriani, whom the count had met in Sicily, and General the Marquis de Rouzières, an old club acquaintance.

After lunch, the ladies served coffee in the drawing-room and the gentlemen were given leave to smoke, on condition that they stayed where they were and talked. One of the girls amused them by telling their fortunes on the cards. The conversation afterwards turned on the subject of celebrated crimes. And thereupon M. de Rouzières, who never neglected an opportunity of teasing the count, brought up the affair of the necklace, a subject which M. de Dreux detested.

Everyone proceeded to give his opinion. Everyone summed up the evidence in his own way. And, of course, all the conclusions were contradictory and all equally inadmissible.

"And what is your opinion, monsieur?" asked the countess of the Cavaliere Floriani.

"Oh, I have no opinion, madame."

There was a general outcry of protest inasmuch as the chevalier had only just been most brilliantly describing a series of adventures in which he had taken part with his father, a magistrate at Palermo, and in which he had given evidence of his taste for these matters and of his sound judgment.

"I confess," he said, "that I have sometimes managed to succeed where the experts had abandoned all their attempts. But I am far from considering myself a Sherlock Holmes . . . And, besides, I hardly know the facts . . ."

All faces were turned to the master of the house, who was reluctantly compelled to recapitulate the details. The chevalier listened, reflected, put a few questions and murmured :

"It's odd . . . at first sight, the thing does not seem to me so difficult to guess at."

The count shrugged his shoulders. But the others flocked round the chevalier, who resumed, in a rather dogmatic tone :

"As a general rule, in order to discover the author of a theft or other crime, we have first to determine how this theft or crime was committed, or at least how it may have been committed. In the present case, nothing could be simpler, to my mind, for we find ourselves faced not by a number of different suppositions, but by one hard certainty, which is that the individual was able to enter only by the door of the bedroom or the window of the linen-closet. Now a bolted door cannot be opened from the outside. Therefore he must have entered by the window."

"It was closed and it was found closed," said M. Dreux, flatly.

Floriani took no notice of the interruption and continued :

"In order to do so, he had only to fix a bridge of some sort, say a plank or a ladder, between the balcony outside the kitchen and the ledge of the window; and, as soon as the jewel-case . . ."

"But, I tell you, the window was closed!" cried the count, impatiently.

This time, Floriani was obliged to reply. He did so with the greatest calmness, like a man who refuses to be put out by so insignificant an objection :

"I have no doubt that it was; but is there no hinged pane?"

"How do you know?"

"To begin with, it is almost a rule in houses of this period. And next, there must be one, because otherwise the theft would be inexplicable."

"As a matter of fact, there is one, but it was closed, like the window. We did not even pay attention to it."

"That was a mistake. For, if you had paid attention to it, you would obviously have seen that it had been opened."

"And how?"

"I presume that, like all of them, it opens by means of a twisted iron wire, with a ring at the bottom?"

"Yes."

"And did this ring hang down between the casement and the chest?"

"Yes, but I do not understand . . ."

"It is like this. Through some cleft or cranny in the pane, they must have contrived, with the aid of an instrument of some sort, say an iron rod ending in a hook, to grip the ring, press down upon it and open the pane."

The count sneered :

"That's perfect! Perfect! You settle it all so easily! Only you have forgotten one thing, my dear sir, which is that there was no cleft or cranny in the pane."

"Oh, but there was!"

"How can you say that? We should have seen it."

"To see a thing one must look; and you did not look. The cleft exists, it is materially impossible that it should not exist, down the side of the pane, along the putty . . . vertically, of course . . ."

The count rose. He seemed greatly excited, took two or three nervous strides across the room and, going up to Floriani, said :

"Nothing has been changed up there since that day . . . no one has set foot in that closet."

"In that case, monsieur, it is open to you to assure yourself that my explanation agrees with reality."

"It agrees with none of the facts which the police ascertained. You have seen nothing, you know nothing and you oppose all that ~~we~~ we have seen and know."

Floriani did not appear to remark the count's irritation, and said, with a smile :

"Well, monsieur, I am trying to see plainly, that is all. If I am wrong, you have only to prove it."

"So I will, this very minute . . . I confess that, in the long run, your assurance . . ."

M. de Dreux mumbled a few words more and then, suddenly, turned to the door and went out.

No one spoke a word. All waited anxiously, as though convinced that a particle of the truth was about to appear. And the silence was marked by an extreme gravity.

At last, the count was seen standing in the doorway. He was pale and singularly agitated. He addressed his friends in a voice trembling with emotion :

"I beg your pardon . . . Monsieur Floriani's revelations have taken me so greatly by surprise . . . I should never have thought . . ."

His wife asked him, eagerly :

"What is it? . . . Tell us . . . Speak . . ."

He stammered out :

"The cleft is there . . . at the very place mentioned . . . down the side of the pane . . ."

Abruptly seizing the chevalier's arm, he said, in an imperious tone :

"And now, monsieur, continue . . . I admit that you have been right so far, but now . . . That is not all . . . Tell me . . . what happened, according to you?"

Floriani gently released his arm and, after a moment's interval, said :

"Well, according to me, what happened is that the individual, whoever he was, knowing that Madame de Dreux was going to wear the necklace at the reception, put his foot-bridge in position during your absence. He watched you through the window and saw you hide the diamonds. As soon as you were gone, he passed some implement down the pane and pulled the ring."

"Very well, but the distance is too great to allow of his reaching the window-latch through the hinged pane."

"If he was unable to open the window, he must have got in through the hinged pane itself."

"Impossible; there is not a man so slight in figure as to obtain admission that way."

"Then it was not a man."

"What do you mean?"

"What I say. If the passage ~~was~~ too narrow to admit a man, then it must have been a child."

"A child?"

"Did you not tell me that your friend Henriette had a son?"

"I did : a son called Raoul."

"It is extremely likely that Raoul committed the theft."

"What evidence have you?"

"What evidence? . . . There is no lack of evidence . . . For instance . . ." He was silent and reflected for a few seconds. Then he continued, "For instance, it is incredible that the child could have brought a foot-bridge from the outside and taken it away again unperceived. He must have employed what lay ready to hand. In the little room where Henriette did her cooking, were there not some shelves against the wall on which she kept her pots and pans?"

"There were two shelves, as far as I remember."

"We must find out if these shelves are really fixed to the wooden brackets that support them. If not, we are entitled to believe that the child unnailed them and then fastened them together. Perhaps, also if there was a range, we shall discover the stove-hook, or plate-lifter, which he must have employed to open the hinged pane."

The count went out, without a word; and, this time, the others did not even feel that little touch of anxiety attendant upon the unknown which they had experienced on the first occasion. They knew, they knew absolutely that Floriani's views were correct. There emanated from that man an impression of such positive certainty that they listened to him not as though he were deducing facts one from the other, but as though he were describing events the accuracy of which it was easy to verify as he proceeded. And no one felt surprised when the count returned and said :

"Yes, it was the child . . . there's no doubt about it . . . everything proves it."

"Did you see the shelves . . . the stove-hook?"

"I did . . . the nails have been taken out of the planks . . . the stove-hook is still there . . ."

But Madame de Dreux-Soubise exclaimed :

"The child, you say! . . . But you mean his mother. Henriette is the only guilty person. She must have compelled her son to . . ."

"No," said the chevalier, "the mother had nothing to do with it."

"Come, come! They occupied the same room; the child cannot have acted unknown to Henriette."

"They occupied the same room; but everything happened in the adjoining recess, at night, while the mother was asleep."

"And what about the necklace?" said the count. "It would have been found among the child's things."

"I beg your pardon. He used to go out. The very morning when you found him with his book, he had come back from school; and perhaps the police, instead of exhausting their resources against the innocent mother, would have been better advised to make a search there, in his desk, among his lesson-books."

"Very well. But the two thousand francs which Henriette received every year : is not that the best sign of her complicity?"

"Would she have written to thank you for the money, if she had been an accomplice? Besides, was she not kept under observation? Whereas the child was free and had every facility for going to the nearest town, seeing a dealer and selling him a diamond cheaply, or two diamonds, as the case demanded . . . the only condition being that the money should be sent from Paris, in consideration of which the transaction would be repeated next year!"

The Dreux-Soubises and their guests were oppressed by an undefinable sense of uneasiness. There was really in Floriani's tone and attitude something more than that certainty which had so greatly irritated the count from the beginning. There was something resembling irony, an irony, moreover, that seemed hostile rather than sympathetic and friendly, as it ought to have been. The count affected to laugh.

"All this is delightfully ingenious. Accept my compliments. What a brilliant imagination you possess!"

"No, no, no!" cried Floriani, with increasing seriousness. "I am not imagining anything; I am calling up circumstances which were inevitably such as I have described them to you."

"What do you know of them?"

"What you yourself have told me. I picture the life of the mother and the child, down there, in the country; the mother falling ill; the tricks and inventions of the little fellow to sell the stones and save his mother, or at least to ease her last moments. Her illness carries her off. She dies. Years pass. The child grows up, becomes a man. And then—this time, I am willing to admit that I am giving scope to my imagination—suppose that this man should feel a longing to return to the places where his childhood was spent, that he sees them once again, that he finds the people who have suspected and accused his mother: think of the poignant interest at such an interview in the old house under whose roof the different stages of the drama were enacted!"

His words echoed for a moment or two amid the anxious silence; and the faces of M. and Madame de Dreux revealed a desperate endeavour to understand, combined with an agonising dread of understanding. The count asked, between his teeth:

"Tell me, sir! Who are you?"

"I? Why, the Cavaliere Floriani, whom you met at Palermo and whom you have had the kindness to invite to your house time after time."

"Then what is the meaning of this story?"

"Oh, nothing at all! It is a mere joke on my part. I am trying to picture to myself the delight which Henriette's son, if he were still alive, would take in telling you that he is the only culprit and that he became so because his mother was on the point of losing her place as a . . . as a domestic servant, which was her only means of livelihood, and because the child suffered at the sight of his mother's unhappiness."

He had half-risen from his seat and, bending towards the countess, was expressing himself in terms of suppressed emotion. There was no doubt possible. The Cavaliere Floriani was none other than Henriette's son. Everything in his attitude, in his words, proclaimed the fact. Besides, was it not his evident intention, his wish, to be recognised as such?

The count hesitated. What line of conduct was he to adopt towards this daring individual? Ring the bell? Provoke a scandal? Unmask the villain who had robbed him? But it was so long ago. And who would believe this story of a guilty child? No, it was better to accept the position and pretend not to grasp its real meaning. And going up to Floriani, he said, playfully:

"Your little romance is very interesting and very entertaining. It has quite taken hold of me, I assure you. But, according to you, what became of that exemplary young man, that model son? I trust that he did not stop on his prosperous road to fortune."

"Certainly not!"

"Why, of course not! After so fine a start, too! At the age of six, to capture the Queen's Necklace, the celebrated necklace coveted by Marie-Antoinette!"

"And to capture it, mind you," said Floriani, entering into the count's mood, "to capture it without its costing him the smallest unpleasantness, the police never taking it into their heads to examine the condition of the panes or notice that the window-ledge was too clean after he had wiped it so as to remove the marks of his feet on the thick dust . . . You must admit that this was enough to turn the head of a scapegrace of his years. It was all so easy, was it not? He had only to wish and to put out his hand . . . Well, he wished. . . ."

"And he put out his hand?"

"Both hands!" replied the chevalier, laughing.

A shudder passed through his hearers. What mystery concealed the life of this self-styled Floriani? How extraordinary must be the existence of this adventurer, a gifted thief at the age of six, who, to-day, with the refinement of taste of a dilettante in search of emotion, or, at most, to satisfy a sense of revenge, had come to brave his victim in that victim's own house, audaciously, madly, and yet with all the good-breeding of a man of the world on a visit!

He rose and went up to the countess to take his leave. She suppressed a movement of recoil. He smiled:

"Ah, madame, you are frightened. Have I carried my little comedy of drawing-room magic too far?"

"Not at all, monsieur. On the contrary, the legend of that good son has interested me greatly, and I am happy to think that my necklace should have been the occasion of so brilliant a career. But does it not seem to you that the son of that . . . of that woman, of Henriette, was, above all things, obeying his natural vocation?"

He started, felt the point of her remark, and replied:

"I am sure he was; and, in fact, his vocation must have been a serious one, or the child would have been discouraged."

"Why?"

"Well, you know, most of the stones were false. The only real ones were the few diamonds bought off the English jeweller. The others had been sold, one by one, in obedience to the stern necessities of life."

"It was the Queen's Necklace, monsieur, for all that," said the countess haughtily, "and that, it seems to me, is what Henriette's son was unable to understand."

"He must have understood, madame, that, false or genuine, the necklace was, before all, a show thing, an advertisement."

M. de Dreux made a movement. His wife stopped him at once:

"Monsieur," she said, "if the man to whom you allude has the least vestige of shame . . ."

She hesitated, shrinking before Floriani's calm gaze. He repeated after her:

"If he has the least vestige of shame . . ."

She felt that she would gain nothing by speaking to him in this way; and, despite her anger and indignation, quivering with humiliated pride, she said, almost politely :

“Monsieur, tradition says that Rétaux de Villette, when the Queen’s Necklace was in his hands, forced out all the diamonds, but dared not touch the setting. He understood that the diamonds were but the ornaments, the accessories, whereas the setting was the essential work, the creation of the artist; and he respected it. Do you think that this man understood ~~as~~ much?”

“I have no doubt but that the setting exists. The child respected it.”

“Well, monsieur, if ever you happen to meet him, tell him that he is acting unjustly in keeping one of those relics which are the property and the glory of certain families and that, though he may have removed the stones, the Queen’s Necklace continues to belong to the house of Dreux-Soubise. It is ours as much as our name or our honour.”

The chevalier replied, simply :

“I will tell him so, madame.”

He bowed low before her, bowed to the count, bowed to all the visitors, one after the other, and went out.

Four days later, Madame de Dreux found a red-morocco case, stamped with the arms of the Cardinal de Rohan, on her bedroom table. She opened it. It contained the necklace of Marie-Antoinette.

But, as, in the life of any logical and single-minded man, all things must needs tend towards the same object—and a little advertisement never yet did any harm—the Echo de France of the next day contained the following sensational paragraph :

“The Queen’s Necklace, the famous historic jewel stolen many years since from the Dreux-Soubise family, has been recovered by Arsène Lupin. Arsène Lupin has hastened to restore it to its lawful owners. This delicate and chivalrous attention is sure to meet with universal commendation.”

MADAME IMBERT'S SAFE

MADAME IMBERT'S SAFE

It was three o'clock in the morning and there were still some half-dozen carriages in front of one of those small houses, mostly occupied by artists, which form the one side of the Boulevard Berthier. The door of this house opened. A group of guests, men and women, came out into the street. Four carriages drove off to right and left and there remained upon the pavement only two gentlemen, who parted company at the corner of the Rue de Courcelles, where one of them lived. The other decided to go home to the Porte-Maillot on foot.

He therefore crossed the Avenue de Villiers and continued his road on the side opposite the fortifications. He found it pleasant walking in this bright and frosty winter night. The sound of his footsteps echoed gaily as he went.

But, after some minutes, he began to have the disagreeable impression that he was being followed. And, in fact, on turning round, he perceived the shadow of a man gliding between the trees. He was not of a timid habit; nevertheless, he hastened his steps in order to reach the Octroi des Ternes as quickly as possible. But the man behind him broke into a run; and feeling more or less anxious, he thought it better to face him and to take his revolver from his pocket.

He did not have time to complete his purpose. The man attacked him violently and, then and there, a fight commenced on the deserted boulevard, a fight at close quarters in which he at once felt that he had the disadvantage. He shouted for help, struggled and was knocked down against a heap of flint-stones, caught by the throat and gagged with a handkerchief which his adversary stuffed into his mouth. His eyes closed, his ears buzzed and he was on the point of losing consciousness when, suddenly, the pressure was relieved and the man who had been stifling him with the weight of his body rose to defend himself, in his turn, against an unexpected attack.

A blow on the wrist from a walking-stick, a kick on the ankle . . . and the man gave two groans of pain and ran away, limping and swearing.

Without condescending to go in pursuit, the new-comer stooped down and asked :

"Are you hurt, sir?"

The victim was not hurt, but dazed and unable to stand. As luck would have it, one of the officials of the octroi, attracted by the shouts, came hastening up. A cab was hailed and the gentleman stepped into it, accompanied by his rescuer, and was driven to his house in the Avenue de la Grande-Armée :

On arriving at his door, now quite recovered, he was lost in thanks :

"I owe you my life, sir, and you may be sure that I shall never forget it. I do not wish to alarm my wife at this time of night, but I want her to thank you herself before the day is out."

He begged the other to come to lunch and told him his name, Ludovic Imbert, adding :

"May I know to whom I have the honour . . .?"

"Certainly," said the other, introducing himself. "Arsène Lupin."

* * * *

At that time—this was five years ago—Arsène Lupin had not yet attained the celebrity which he owed to the Cahorn case, his escape from the Santé and a number of other resounding exploits. He was not even called Arsène Lupin. This name, for which the future held so glorious a renown in store, was specially invented to denote M. Imbert's rescuer, who may be said to have won his spurs in this encounter. Ready for the fray, it is true, armed at all points, but without resources, without the authority which success gives, Arsène was but an apprentice in a profession of which he was, ere long, to become a past-master.

It was only natural that he should feel a thrill of delight when he woke up and remembered the invitation of the night before. The goal was within reach at last! At last he was undertaking a work worthy of his powers and of his talent! The Imbert millions: what a magnificent prey for an appetite like his!

He made a special toilet: a threadbare frock-coat, shabby trousers, a rusty silk hat, frayed shirt-collar and cuffs, the whole very clean, but having all the appearance of poverty. Thus attired, he went down the staircase of his lodgings at Montmartre. On reaching the third floor, without stopping, he tapped at a closed door with the knob of his walking-stick. Leaving the house, he made for the outer boulevards. A tram-car passed. He jumped into it and a man who had been walking behind him, the occupant of the third floor, promptly took the seat beside him.

After a moment, the man said:

"Well, governor?"

"Well, it's done."

"How?"

"I'm lunching there."

"You're lunching there?"

"You wouldn't have me risk a life as precious as mine for nothing, I hope? I have snatched Monsieur Ludovic Imbert from the certain death which you had prepared for him. Monsieur Ludovic Imbert has a grateful heart. He has asked me to lunch."

A silence; and then the other ventured:

"So you're not giving it up?"

"My boy," said Arsène, "after plotting that little assault of last night, after taking the trouble, at three o'clock in the morning, along the fortifications, to give you a bang on the wrist and a kick on the shin and running the risk of inflicting personal damage on my one and only friend, it's not likely that I should give up the profits arising from a rescue so carefully planned."

"But the unfavourable reports circulating about the fortune . . ."

"Let them circulate! It is six months since I first took the matter in hand, six months since I began to collect information, to study the case, to lay my snares, to question the servants, the money-lenders and the men of straw, six months since I started shadowing the husband and wife. I don't care whether fortune proceeds from old Rawford, as they contend, or from another source; but I declare that it exists. And as it exists, I mean to have it."

"Jupiter! A hundred millions!"

"Say ten, or five, no matter! There are fat bundles of securities in the safe. I'll be hanged if I don't, sooner or later, lay hands on the key."

The car stopped at the Place de l'Etoile.

"So, for the present . . .?"

"Nothing to be done. I'll let you know. There's plenty of time."

Five minutes later, Arsène Lupin climbed the sumptuous staircase of the Hôtel Imbert and Ludovic introduced him to his wife. Gervaise was a nice little woman, round as a ball, and very talkative. She gave him the warmest of greetings:

"We wanted to be by ourselves to entertain our rescuer," she said.

And from the first they treated "our rescuer" as a friend of long standing. By the time that the dessert was reached, the intimacy was complete and confidences were exchanged at a great pace. Arsène told the story of his own life and the life of his father, an upright magistrate, described his sad childhood, his present difficulties. Gervaise, in her turn, talked of her youth, her marriage, old Rawford's kindnesses, the hundred millions which she had inherited, the obstacles that delayed her entering into their enjoyment, the loans which she had had to raise at exorbitant rates of interest, her endless strife with Rawford's nephews. And the injunctions! And the sequestrations! In fact, the whole story.

"Just think, Monsieur Lupin, the scrip is there, in the next room, in my husband's office, and, if we cut off a single coupon, we lose everything! The securities are there, in our safe, and we cannot touch them!"

A light shiver passed through M. Lupin's frame at the thought of this proximity, and he felt very clearly that he would never have enough elevation of soul to entertain the same scruples as the worthy lady :

"Oh, they are in there!" he murmured with a parched throat.

"They are in there."

Relations begun under such auspices were bound to lead to closer ties still. In reply to questions delicately worded, Arsène Lupin confessed his poverty, his distress. Then and there, the poor fellow was appointed private secretary to this husband and wife at a salary of one hundred and fifty francs a month. He was to go on living where he was, but to come every morning and receive his instructions for the day's work. For his greater comfort, a room on the second floor was placed at his disposal as a study.

He chose one for himself. By what stroke of luck did it happen to be over Ludovic's office?

It did not take Arsène long to perceive that his secretaryship bore a furious likeness to a sinecure. In two months, he was given only four insignificant letters to copy out and was only once called into his employer's office, which permitted him only once to obtain an official view of the safe. He noted, besides, that the titular of this sinecure was not even deemed worthy of figuring beside Anquety, the deputy, or Grouvel, the leader of the bar, for he was never invited to the famous fashionable receptions.

He did not complain, for he much preferred his modest little place in the shade. Free and happy, he kept himself to himself. Nor did he waste time. From the first, he paid a certain number of clandestine visits to Ludovic's office and offered his humble duty to the safe, which remained none the less hermetically sealed. This safe was a huge mass of cast-iron and steel, presenting a surly and stubborn appearance, and no file or gimlet or crowbar could prevail against it.

Arsène Lupin was not an obstinate man :

"Where force fails, craft succeeds," he said. "The great thing is to keep one's eyes and ears open."

He accordingly took the necessary measurements and, after much careful and difficult boring, inserted through the floor of his room a piece of lead pipe, which came out in the office-ceiling, between two projections in the cornice. Through this pipe, which served as both a speaking-tube and a spy-glass, he hoped to hear and see.

Thenceforward, he spent his days lying flat on the floor of his room. And, as a matter of fact, he often saw the Imberts in close conference before the safe, turning up books and handling bundles of papers. When they twisted in succession the four knobs that worked the lock, he tried, in order to learn the figure, to catch the number of notches that were passed. He watched their movements, listened to their words. What did they do with the key? Did they hide it somewhere?

One day, he ran hurriedly downstairs, having seen them leave the room without locking the safe. He boldly entered the office. They had returned.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, I came to the wrong door . . ."

But Gervaise ran up to him and drew him into the room :

"Come in, Monsieur Lupin," she said, "come in, you're at home here. I want you to advise us. Which do you think we ought to sell? Foreigners or Rentes?"

"But what about the injunction?" asked Lupin, greatly astonished.

"Oh, it does not affect all the securities."

She flung open the door of the safe. The shelves were heaped up with portfolios fastened with straps. She took out one of them. But her husband protested :

"No, no, Gervaise, it would be madness to sell foreign stock. It is going up . . . Now the Rentes are as high as they are likely to go. What do you think, my dear fellow?"

The dear fellow had no opinion on the subject; however, he advised the sacrifice of the Rentes. Thereupon, she caught hold of another bundle of papers, and from it, took a document at random. It was a bond in the Three-per-Cents. Ludovic put it in his pocket. In the afternoon, accompanied by his secretary, he took the bond to a broker to sell and received forty-six thousand francs for it.

In spite of what Gervaise had said, Arsène Lupin did not feel at home. On the contrary, his position in the Hôtel Imbert filled him with surprise. He often observed that the servants did not know his name. They spoke of him as "monsieur". Ludovic always referred to him as such :

"Tell monsieur . . . Has monsieur come?"

Why this enigmatical designation?

Moreover, after the first enthusiasm, the Imberts hardly spoke to him, and, while treating him with the consideration due to a benefactor, took no further notice of him at all! They appeared to look upon him as an eccentric who did not wish to be intruded on, and they respected his isolation as though this isolation had been a rule laid down by himself, a whim of his own. Once, as he was passing through the hall, he heard Gervaise remark to two gentlemen :

"He's so shy!"

"All right," he thought, "we're shy."

And he ceased to worry his head about the oddities of these people and pursued the execution of his plan. He had acquired the certainty that he must not rely upon chance or upon any act of thoughtlessness on the part of Gervaise, who never left the key out of her possession and who, besides, never took away the key without first mixing up the permutations of the lock. He must, therefore, act for himself.

One thing hastened matters, which was the violent campaign conducted against the Imberts by a section of the press. They were accused of swindling. Arsène Lupin followed the evolutions of the drama and the consequent excitement in the household, and he understood that, if he waited much longer, he would lose all.

On five days in succession, instead of leaving at six o'clock, as was his habit, he locked himself into his room. He was supposed to have gone out. Stretched at full length on the floor, he watched Ludovic's office.

On the sixth day, as the favourable circumstances for which he was waiting had not occurred, he went away in the middle of the night by the little door in the courtyard, of which he had a key.

But, on the seventh day, he learned that the Imberts, by way of replying to the malevolent insinuations of their enemies, had offered to open the safe.

"It's to-night or never," thought Lupin.

And, in fact, after dinner, Ludovic went to his office, followed by Gervaise. They began to turn over the pages of the books in the safe.

An hour passed; another hour. He heard the servants go up to bed. Now, there was no one left on the first floor. Midnight struck. The Imberts went on with their work.

"Come along," muttered Lupin.

He opened his window. It looked out upon the courtyard; and the space, on this moonless, starless night, was dark. He took from his cupboard a knotted rope, fastened it to the railing of the balcony, stepped over and let himself down gently, with the help of a gutter-spout, to the window beneath his own, it was the window of the office and the thick curtains hid the room from his eyes. He stood for a moment motionless, stretching his ears and straining his eyes, on the balcony.

Reassured by the silence, he gave a slight push to the casement-windows. If no one had made it his business to test them, they ought to yield to his pressure, for, in the course of the afternoon, he had twisted the latch in such a way as to prevent it from entering the staple.

The casements yielded. Thereupon, with infinite precautions, he opened them a little farther. As soon as he was able to pass his head through, he stopped. A gleam of light filtered out between the curtains, which did not quite meet. He saw Gervaise and Ludovic sitting by the safe.

Absorbed in their work, they exchanged but a few occasional words, in a low voice. Arsène calculated the distance that separated him from them, settled upon the exact movements that would be necessary to reduce them to a state of helplessness, one after the other, before they had time to call for help, and was about to rush in upon them, when Gervaise said :

“How cold the room has turned ! I am going to bed. What shall you do?”

“I should like to finish first.”

“Finish ! Why, it will take you all night !”

“Oh, no, an hour at the most.”

She went away. Twenty minutes, thirty minutes elapsed. Arsène pushed the window a little more. The curtains shook. He pushed still farther. Ludovic turned round and, seeing the curtains swollen by the wind, rose to shut the window . . .

There was not a cry, not even the appearance of a struggle. With a few accurate movements and without doing Ludovic the slightest harm, Arsène stunned him, wrapped his head in the curtain and tied him up so that he was not even able to distinguish his assailant's features.

Then he went quickly to the safe, took two portfolios, which he put under his arm, left the office, went down the stairs, crossed the courtyard and opened the door of the tradesmen's entrance. A cab was waiting in the street.

“Take these first,” he said to the driver, “and come with me.”

They went back to the office. In two journeys, they emptied the safe. Then Arsène went up to his room, hoisted in the rope, removed every trace of his passage. The thing was done.

A few hours after, Arsène Lupin, assisted by his companion, cleared the portfolios of their contents. He felt no disappointment, having foreseen as much, on ascertaining that the fortune of the Imberts had not the importance ascribed to it. The millions did not number hundreds, or even tens. But, at any rate, the total made up a very respectable sum and consisted of excellent securities : railway debentures, municipal loans, State funds, Northern Mines, and so on.

He declared himself satisfied :

"No doubt," he said, "there will be a sad loss when the time comes for dealing. There will be obstacles to contend with and I shall often have to let things go very cheap. Never mind! With this first capital, I undertake to live according to my ideas . . . and to realise a few dreams that lie near my heart."

"And the rest?"

"Burn them, my lad. These piles of papers looked very well in the safe. They're no use to us. As for the securities, we'll lock them up in the cupboard and wait calmly till the auspicious moment arrives to dispose of them."

The next morning, Arsène saw no reason why he should not return to the Hôtel Imbert. But the papers contained an unexpected piece of news; Ludovic and Gervaise had disappeared.

The safe was opened amid great solemnity. The magistrates found what Arsène had left behind . . . which was very little.

Such are the facts and such the explanation of some of them, owing to the intervention of Arsène Lupin. I had the story from his own lips, one day when he was in a confidential vein.

He was walking up and down my study and his eyes wore a feverish look which I had never seen in them before.

"On the whole, therefore," I said, "this is your masterpiece."

Without giving me a direct answer, he continued :

"There are impenetrable secrets in this business. Even after the explanation which I have given you, a number of mysteries remain unsolved. For instance, why that flight? Why did they not take advantage of the assistance which I had involuntarily rendered them? It would have been so simple to say, "The millions were there, in the safe. They are not there now, because they have been stolen." "

"They lost their heads."

"Yes, that's it: they lost their heads. . . . On the other hand, it is true . . ."

"What is true . . . ?"

"Oh, never mind."

What did this reticence mean? He had not told me all, that was obvious; and what he had not told he disliked telling. I was puzzled. The thing must be serious to provoke hesitation in a man of his stamp.

I put a few questions to him at haphazard :

"Did you never see them again?"

"No."

"And did it never occur to you to feel any pity for those poor wretches?"

"I?" he cried, with a start.

His excitement astonished me. Had I hit the mark? I said:

"Of course. But for you, they might have stayed and faced the music . . . or, at least, gone off with their pockets filled."

"You expect me to feel remorse: is that it?"

"Well, in a sense."

He struck the table with his clenched fist :

"So, according to you, I ought to feel remorse!"

"You can call it remorse or regret, a feeling of some kind . . ."

"A feeling of some kind for that couple . . ."

"For a couple whom you robbed of a fortune."

"What fortune?"

"Well . . . those two or three bundles of securities . . ."

"Those two or three bundles of securities! I robbed them of bundles of securities, did I? Part of their legacy? Is that what I did? Is that my crime? But, bless my soul, my dear chap, haven't you guessed that those securities were so many forgeries? . . . Do you hear? They were forgeries!"

I looked at him, dumbfounded :

"What, those four or five millions were forgeries . . .?"

"Forgeries!" he shouted, in his rage. "Forgeries, every scrap : the debentures, the municipal loans, the State funds; not worth the paper they were printed on! Not a sou, not a single sou did I get out of the whole lot. And you ask me to feel remorse! But it's they who ought to feel remorse! They cheated me like a common jay! They plucked me like the meanest of their pigeons and the stupidest!"

He shook with a perfectly genuine anger, made up of personal resentment and wounded pride :

"Don't you see that they had the better of me from first to last, from start to finish? Do you know what part I played in the business, or rather what part they made me play? I was Andrew Rawford? Yes, my dear fellow, and I was completely taken in! I only learnt it after reading the newspapers and comparing certain details. While I was posing as the benefactor, as the gentleman who had risked his life to save Imbert from the hooligans, he was passing me off as one of the Rawfords! Isn't it admirable? That eccentric who had his room on the second floor, that shy man whom they pointed to at a distance was Rawford; and Rawford was myself! And, thanks to me, thanks to the confidence which I inspired under the name of Rawford, the banks granted loans and the solicitors persuaded their clients to lend their money! What a school, what a school for a beginner! Ah, I learnt a useful lesson there, I assure you!"

He stopped suddenly, caught me by the arm and, in a tone of exasperation in which, nevertheless, it was easy to perceive a certain shade of mingled admiration and irony, he added this ineffable phrase :

"My dear chap, at this moment, Gervaise Imbert owes me fifteen hundred francs!"

This time, I could not help laughing. It was really a splendid joke, and Arsène himself entered into the spirit of it :

"Yes, my dear fellow, fifteen hundred francs! Not only did I not receive a sou of my salary, but she borrowed fifteen hundred francs of me! The whole of the savings of my youth! And do you know what for? I'll give you a thousand guesses . . . For her charities! I mean what I say! For poor people whom she pretended to be relieving, unknown to Ludovic! And I fell into the trap! A good joke, isn't it? Arsène Lupin done out of fifteen hundred francs by the good lady whom he ~~was~~ robbing of four millions in forged securities! And think of the contrivings, the efforts, the ingenious tricks to which I had to resort to achieve that magnificent result! It's the only time I've been swindled in my life! But, by Jove, I was had that time and finely to good purpose!"

THE BLACK PEARL

THE BLACK PEARL

A VIOLENT ring at the bell woke the concierge at No. 9, Avenue Hoche, from her sleep. She pulled the cord, muttering:

"I thought they were all in. It's past three!"

Her husband growled:

"Perhaps it's for the doctor."

And a voice did, in fact, ask:

"Doctor Harel . . . which floor?"

"Third floor, on the left. But the doctor won't be disturbed at night."

"He'll have to be, this time."

The caller entered the hall, went up one floor, two floors, and without even stopping on Dr. Harel's landing, continued as far as the fifth. Here, he tried two keys. One opened the lock, the other unfastened the safety-catch.

"Capital," he muttered. "This simplifies matters considerably. But, before setting to work, let's provide for our retreat. Let me see . . . have I allowed a reasonable time for ringing at the doctor's and being sent away? Not yet . . . I must wait a little longer . . ."

He let ten minutes elapse, then went downstairs again and tapped at the pane of the porter's box, raging and fuming against the doctor as he did so. The front door was opened for him and he slammed it behind him. But the door did not shut, for the man had quickly applied a piece of iron to the staple to prevent the bolt from entering.

He returned without a sound, unobserved by the concierge and her husband. In case of alarm, his retreat was assured.

He calmly reascended the five flights. Entering the hall of the flat, by the light of a portable electric lamp, he put his hat and coat on one of the chairs, sat down on another and drew a pair of thick slippers over his boots :

"So much for that!" he said. "And an easy job too! I sometimes ask myself why everybody doesn't choose the comfortable profession of a burglar. Given a little skill and reflective power, there's nothing more charming. It's such a restful trade, a regular family-man's trade . . . It's even too simple . . . It ceases to be amusing . . ."

He unfolded a minute plan of the flat :

"Let us begin by taking our bearings. Ah, here is the square hall in which I am sitting. Looking out on the street we have the drawing-room, the boudoir and the dining-room. No use wasting time there: it appears that the countess has a very poor taste . . . there's not a knick-knack of any value . . . So let's come to the point at once . . . Ah, here is a passage: the passage that leads to the bedrooms. At a distance of three yards, I ought to find the door of the wardrobe-closet communicating with the countess's room."

He folded up his plan, put out his lantern, and walked down the passage, counting :

"One yard . . . two yards . . . three yards . . . Here is the door . . . How well it all fits in! Bless my soul! A mere bolt, a tiny bolt, separates me from the bedroom, and moreover, I know that the bolt is at three feet and a half from the floor. . . . So that, with the aid of a little incision which I propose to make around it, we can easily get rid of it . . ."

He took the necessary implements from his pocket. But an idea stopped him :

"Supposing the bolt should happen to be unfastened . . . I may as well try."

He turned the handle of the lock. To his great surprise, the door opened.

"Arsène Lupin, my fine fellow, fortune's on your side to-night, there's no doubt of that! What more do you want? You know the geography of your field of operations; you know where the countess hides the black pearl . . . Consequently, the black pearl is yours . . . All you have to do is to be more silent than silence itself, more invisible than the darkness."

Arsène Lupin took quite half an hour to open the second door, a glass door leading to the bedroom. But he opened it with such infinite precautions that, even if the countess had been awake, no suspicious sound could have occurred to alarm her.

According to the indications marked on his plan, he had only to follow the circuit of a sofa. This would bring him first to an easy-chair and then to a little table beside the bed. On the table was a box of stationery and hidden quite simply inside this box was the black pearl.

He crouched at full length on the carpet and followed the line of the sofa. But, on reaching the end of it, he stopped to check the beating of his heart. Although he felt no fear, he found it impossible to overcome that sort of nervous anguish which a man experiences in a silence that is greater than usual. And he was astonished at this, for, after all, he had passed through moments more solemn than the present without undergoing any sort of emotion. He was threatened by no danger. Then why was his heart beating like a mad bell? Was it that sleeping woman that impressed him, that life so close to his own?

He listened and seemed to distinguish a rhythmical breathing. He felt reassured, as though by a friendly presence.

He found his way to the chair and then, with little, imperceptible movements, crept towards the table, groping in the darkness with his outstretched arm. His right hand touched one of the legs of the table.

At last! He had only to rise to his feet, take the black pearl, and go. It was as well, for his heart was again beginning to thump in his chest like a terrified animal and so noisily that it seemed impossible that the countess should not wake.

He quieted it with a violent effort of will; but, just as he was trying to rise, his left hand struck against an object, lying on the carpet, which he at once recognised as a candlestick, an overturned candlestick; and, at the same moment, another object offered to his touch, a clock, one of those little travelling-clocks in a leather case.

What did it all mean? What had happened? He could not understand. The clock . . . the candlestick . . . Why were they not in their usual places? Oh, what was happening in the frightful darkness?

And, suddenly, a cry escaped him. He had touched . . . oh, such a strange, nameless thing! But no, no, fear must be affecting his brain! For twenty seconds, for thirty seconds, he lay motionless, terror-stricken, with his temples bathed in perspiration. And his fingers retained the sensation of that touch.

With a relentless effort, he put out his arm again. His hand once more grasped the thing, the strange, nameless thing. He felt it. He insisted that his hand should feel it and take stock of it. . . . It was a head of hair, a face . . . and the face was cold, almost icy cold.

However terrifying a reality may be, a man like Arsène Lupin masters it as soon as he is aware of it. Quickly, he pressed the spring of his lamp. A woman lay before him, covered with blood. Her neck and shoulders were disfigured by hideous wounds. He stooped over her and examined her. She was dead.

“Dead, dead!” he repeated, in his bewilderment.

And he looked at those staring eyes, that grinning mouth, that livid flesh and that blood, all that blood which had flowed upon the carpet and was now congealing, thick and black.

He rose and switched on the electric light. He now saw that the room was filled with signs of a desperate struggle. The bed was entirely disordered, the sheets and blankets torn away. On the floor lay the candlestick, the clock—the hands pointed to twenty minutes past eleven—and, farther off, an overturned chair; and blood on every side, blood in pools and splashes.

“And the black pearl?” he muttered.

The box of stationery was in its place. He opened it hurriedly. It contained the jewel-case. But the case was empty.

"The devil!" he said. "You boasted of your luck a bit too soon, my friend Arsène Lupin. . . . The countess murdered, the black pearl gone . . . I can't congratulate you on the position! We must be off, or you will have a heavy responsibility on your shoulders!"

Nevertheless, he did not stir.

"Be off? Yes, another would be off. But Arsène Lupin? Is there nothing better to be done? Come, let us proceed by order. After all, your conscience is easy. . . . Suppose you were a police commissary and had to make an enquiry. . . . Yes, but, for that, one would need a clearer brain. And mine is in such a state!"

He fell into a chair, pressing his clenched fists against his burning forehead.

* * * *

The murder in the Avenue Hoche is one of the most puzzling of recent years, and I should never have been able to tell the story if the part played in it by Arsène Lupin had not thrown a special light upon it. There are few who suspect the nature of this part. In any case, no one knows the exact and curious facts.

Who, from seeing her drive in the Bois, did not know Léontine Zalti, the once famous opera singer, who became the wife and widow of the Comte d'Andillot; the Zalti, whose luxurious mode of life dazzled Paris some twenty years ago; the Zalti, Comtesse d'Andillot, who owed a European reputation to the magnificence of her sets of diamonds and pearls? People used to say that she carried on her shoulders the strong-rooms of many a banking-house and the gold-mines of many an Australian company. The great jewellers worked for her much as they used to work for the kings and queens of old.

And who does not remember the catastrophe in which all these treasures were swallowed up? Banking-houses and gold-mines, the whirlpool devoured them all. Of the unparalleled collection, dispersed, amid great excitement, under the auctioneer's hammer, the countess retained only the famous black pearl. The black pearl, in other words, a fortune, had she been willing to part with it.

But she consistently refused. Rather than sell this priceless gem, she preferred to economise, to live in a simple flat, with just a companion, a cook and a man-servant. Nor did she hesitate to confess her reason: the black pearl was the gift of an emperor! And, though almost ruined and reduced to the most commonplace sort of existence, she remained faithful to the companion of her better days:

"As long as I live," she said, "it shall never quit my sight."

She wore it round her neck from morning to evening. At night she placed it in a receptacle known to herself alone.

All these facts were related in the newspapers and stimulated public curiosity. And, strange to say, though easy enough to understand for those who possessed the key to the riddle, it was just the arrest of the alleged assassin that complicated the mystery and prolonged the excitement. Two days after the murder, the papers contained the following news:

"We understand that Victor Danègre, the Comtesse d'Andillot's servant, has been arrested. The evidence adduced against him is overwhelming. Bloodstains have been discovered on the lustrin sleeve of his livery waistcoat, which was found in his room, hidden between the mattresses of his bed, by M. Dudouis, the chief of the detective-service. Moreover, one of the stuffed-covered buttons of the waistcoat was missing; and this button was picked up, at an early stage of the investigation, under the victim's bed.

"It seems probable that, after dinner, instead of going to his own room in the attic, Danègre slipped into the wardrobe-closet and, through the glass door, saw the countess hide the black pearl.

"We must add that there is no proof, so far, to confirm this surmise. In any case, one point remains unexplained. At seven o'clock in the morning, Danègre went to a tobacconist's shop on the Boulevard de Courcelles. The concierge and the tobacconist have both given evidence to this effect. On the other hand, the countess's cook and her companion, both of whom sleep at the end of the passage, declare that, at eight o'clock, when they got up, the front-door and the kitchen-door were locked. The two women have been in the countess's service for over twenty years and are above suspicion. The question is, how was Danègre able to leave the flat? Did he have another key made for his use? The enquiry will show."

The enquiry, on the contrary, showed absolutely nothing. It appeared that Victor Danègre was a dangerous criminal, who had already served a term of imprisonment, a confirmed drunkard and a loose-liver, who was not likely to shrink from the use of the knife. But the case itself seemed to become wrapped in a thicker shroud of mystery and in more inexplicable contradictions the longer it was studied.

To begin with, a Mlle. de Sinclèves, the cousin and sole heiress of the murdered woman, declared that the countess, a month before her death, had told her, in one of her letters, of the place where she hid the black pearl. This letter disappeared the day after she received it. Who had stolen it?

The concierge and his wife, on their side, said that they had opened the door to a man who had gone up to Dr. Harel's. The doctor was sent for. No one had rung at his door. In that case, who was the man? An accomplice?

This idea of an accomplice was adopted by the newspapers and the public. Ganimard, old Chief-Inspector Ganimard, accepted it, not without reason:

"Lupin has had a hand in this," he said to the examining magistrate.

"Bah! You see that Arsène Lupin of yours in everything."

"I see him in everything, because he is in everything."

"Say rather that you see him whenever anything does not seem very clear to you. Besides, in this particular case, remember that the crime was committed at twenty minutes past eleven in the evening, ~~as~~ the clock shows, and that the night visit described by the concierge and his wife did not take place until three o'clock in the morning."

The police often yield to a sort of conviction that makes them force events so as to fit in with the first explanation offered. Victor Danègre's antecedents were of a deplorable character—I have already said that he had undergone sentence before, ~~was~~ a drunkard and a loose-liver—and this influenced the magistrate's judgment. Although no new circumstance arose to corroborate the first two or three clues, he refused to be shaken. He closed the enquiry and, a few weeks later, the trial began.

It dragged wearily along. The presiding judge took no interest in the case. The prosecution was feebly conducted. Under these conditions, Danègre's counsel had an easy game to play. He pointed to the gaps and flaws in the evidence. There was no material proof in existence. Who had made the key, the indispensable key, without which Danègre could not have locked the door of the flat on leaving? Who had seen this key and what had become of it? Who had seen the murderer's knife and what had become of that?

"In any case," said counsel, in conclusion, "it rests with the prosecution to prove that my client committed the murder. Let them prove that the perpetrator of the theft and the murder is not the mysterious person who entered the house at three o'clock in the morning. The clock stopped at eleven at night, they say. And then? Cannot the hands of a clock be shifted to any hour that seems convenient?"

Victor Danègre ~~was~~ acquitted.

* * * *

He left prison, one Friday, by the waning light of the afternoon, emaciated and depressed by the six months spent in the cells. The examination, the solitary confinement, the trial, the deliberation of the jury: all this had filled him with a sickly dread. His nights ~~were~~ haunted by hideous dreams and visions of the scaffold. He trembled with fever and terror.

Under the name of Anatole Dufour, he hired a small room on the heights of Montmartre and lived on odd jobs, shifting for himself as best he could. A wretched life! Thrice engaged by three different employers, he was each time recognised as Victor Danègre and dismissed on the spot.

He often saw, or thought he saw, men following him, men, he had no doubt, belonging to the police, who would never rest until they had caught him in some trap. Already he felt a rough hand seize him by the collar.

One evening, he was dining at an eating-house in the neighbourhood, when someone came and sat down opposite him. It was a man of about forty, dressed in a black frock-coat of doubtful cleanliness. He ordered some soup, a dish of vegetables and a quart of wine. And when he had eaten his soup, he looked at Danègre with a long, fixed stare.

Danègre turned pale. Without a doubt, the man was one of those who had been following him for weeks. What did he want with him? Danègre tried to get up. He could not. His legs staggered beneath him.

The stranger poured himself out a glass of wine and filled Danègre's glass:

"Have a drink, mate?"

Victor stammered:

"Thanks . . . thanks . . . your health, mate."

"Your health, Victor Danègre."

The other gave a start:

"I! I! . . . No . . . I assure you . . ."

"You assure me what? That you are not the man you are? Not the countess's servant?"

"Whose servant? My name is Dufour. Ask the landlord."

"Anatole Dufour, yes, to the landlord, but Danègre, Victor Danègre, to the police."

"It's not true, it's not true! They've told you a lie."

The man took a card from his pocket and handed it to him. Victor read :

GRIMAUDAN
Late Detective-Inspector
Enquiries conducted with secrecy and despatch

He shuddered :

"You belong to the police!"

"Not now, but I used to like the trade and I still follow it . . . in a more lucrative way. From time to time, one lights upon a golden job . . . like yours."

"Mine?"

"Yes, yours is an exceptional case, at least if you care to show a little willingness in the matter."

"And, if I don't . . . ?"

"You'll have to. You're in a position in which you can refuse me nothing."

Victor Danègre felt himself overcome by a dull sense of fear. He asked :

"What is it . . . ? Speak out!"

"Very well," said the other, "let's come to the point and have done with it. In two words, I have been sent by Mademoiselle de Sinclèves."

"Sinclèves?"

"The Comtesse d'Andillot's heiress."

"Well?"

"Well, Mademoiselle de Sinclèves has employed me to make you give up the black pearl."

"The black pearl?"

"The one you stole."

"But I haven't got it."

"Yes, you have."

"If I had, I should be the murderer."

"You are the murderer."

Danègre gave a forced laugh :

"Fortunately, my good sir, the court took another view. The jury unanimously found me not guilty, do you see? And when a man has conscience on his side, together with the esteem of twelve good men and true . . ."

The late detective-inspector seized him by the arm :

"None of your speech-making, my lad. Listen to me carefully and weigh my words : they are worth it. Three months before the crime, Danègre, you stole the key of the servant's entrance from the cook and had it copied by Outard, the locksmith, of 244, Rue Oberkampf."

"It's not true, it's not true," growled Victor. "No one has seen the key : there's no such key."

"Here it is!"

After a silence, Grimaudan resumed :

"You killed the countess with a clasp-knife which you bought at the Bazar de la République on the same day that you ordered the key. It has a three-cornered, grooved blade."

"All humbug! You're talking at random. No one has seen the knife."

Victor Danègre started back. The inspector continued :

"There are stains of rust on the blade. Do you want me to tell you where they came from?"

"And then . . . ? You've got a key and a knife. . . . Who can swear that they belonged to me?"

"The locksmith first and next the shop-assistant from whom you bought the knife. I have already refreshed their memories. Once brought face to face with you, they would not fail to know you."

He spoke shortly and sharply, with terrifying precision. Danègre was convulsed with fear. Neither the magistrate nor the judge at his trial, nor even the prosecuting counsel, had pressed him so closely, had seen so clearly into matters which were no longer even very plain to him.

However, he still tried to make a show of indifference :

"If that's all your evidence!"

"I have this besides. After the crime, you went back by the way you came. But, half-way across the wardrobe-closet, seized with fright, you must have leant against the wall to keep your balance."

"How do you know?" stammered Victor. "No one can know."

"The police, no; it could never have entered the heads of any of the gentlemen in the office of the public prosecutor to light a candle and examine the walls. But, if they were to do so, they would see the red mark on the white plaster, a very slight mark, but clear enough to show the print of your thumb, all wet with blood, which you put against the wall. Now you are surely aware that, in the Bertillon system, this forms one of the chief methods of identification."

Victor Danègre was deathly pale. Beads of perspiration fell from his forehead to the table. He stared mad-eyed at this strange man, who was conjuring up his crime as though he had been its unseen witness.

He lowered his head, beaten, powerless. For months, he had been struggling, struggling, as it seemed to him, against the whole world. Against this man he had an impression that there was nothing to be done.

"If I give you back the pearl," he stuttered, "how much will you give me?"

"Nothing."

"What! You're joking! You expect me to give you a thing worth thousands and hundreds of thousands of francs and you to give me nothing?"

"Yes, your life."

The wretched man shuddered. Grimaudan added, in an almost gentle tone:

"Come, Danègre, the pearl is of no value to you. You cannot possibly sell it. What is the good of keeping it."

"There are receivers . . . and, some day or other, at a price . . ."

"Some day or other, it will be too late."

"Why?"

"Why? Because the police will have laid you by the heels again and, this time, with the proofs with which I shall supply them—the knife, the key, the thumb-print—you’re done for, my fine fellow.”

Victor clutched his head in his two hands and reflected. He felt himself lost, irreparably lost, and, at the same time, a great sense of weariness overcame him, an immense need of rest and ease.

He muttered :

“When do you want it?”

“Before one o’clock tonight.”

“And, if you don’t get it . . . ?”

“If I don’t get it, I shall post this letter in which Mademoiselle de Sinclèves denounces you to the public prosecutor.”

Danègre poured himself out two glasses of wine, swallowed them one after the other, and then, rising :

“Pay the bill,” he said, “and let’s go . . . I’ve had enough of this cursed business.”

Night had come. The two men went down the Rue Lepic and along the outer boulevards towards the Etoile. They walked in silence, Victor very wearily, with a bent back.

At the Parc Monceau, he said :

“Of course! You only left it, before your arrest, to go to the tobacco-shop!”

“We’re there,” said Danègre, in a hollow voice.

They went along the railings of the garden and crossed a street of which the corner was formed by the tobacconist’s shop. Danègre stopped a few paces farther on. His legs reeled under him. He dropped on a bench.

“Well?” asked his companion.

“It’s there? What are you talking about?”

“Yes, there, in front of us.”

“In front of us? Look here, Danègre, you had better not . . .”

"I tell you, it's there."

"Where?"

"Between two cobble-stones."

"Which two?"

"Look and see."

"Which two?" repeated Grimaudan.

Victor did not reply.

"Ah, I see, you're trying to hoodwink me, are you?"

"No . . . but . . . I shall die of starvation . . ."

"And so you're hesitating? Well, I'll be generous with you. How much do you want?"

"Enough to pay my passage to America."

"Agreed."

"And a hundred-franc note for expenses."

"You shall have two. And now speak."

"Count the cobbles, to the right of the drain. It's between the twelfth and the thirteenth."

"In the gutter?"

"Yes, just below the curbstone."

Grimaudan looked around him. Tram-cars were passing, people were passing on foot. But, pooh! Who would suspect . . .

He opened his pocket-knife and thrust it between the twelfth and thirteenth cobbles.

"And, if it's not there?"

"If no one saw me stoop and push it in, it must be there still."

Could it be there? The black pearl flung into the mud of a gutter, for the first passer-by to pick up! The black pearl . . . a fortune!

"How far down?"

"About three inches."

He made an opening in the moist earth. The point of his knife struck against something. He widened the hole with his fingers.

The black pearl was there.

"Here, take your two hundred francs. I'll send you your ticket for America."

The next evening, the Echo de France published the following paragraph :

"Yesterday the famous black pearl fell into the hands of Arsène Lupin, who recovered it from the murderer of the Comtesse d'Andillot. Facsimiles of this valuable jewel will shortly be exhibited in London, St. Petersburg, Calcutta, Buenos Ayres and New York.

"Arsène Lupin is prepared to receive offers from his correspondents at home and abroad."

* * * *

"And that is how crime is always punished and virtue rewarded," concluded Arsène Lupin, after he had revealed to me the unknown side of the story.

"I see : that is how, under the name of Grimaudan, a retired detective-inspector, you were selected by fate to deprive the criminal of the fruits of his crime !"

"Exactly. And I confess that it is one of the adventures of which I am most proud. The forty minutes which I spent in the countess's flat, after verifying her death, I number among the most astonishing and momentous in my life. Caught in an apparently inextricable situation, in forty minutes I had reconstructed the crime and, thanks to a few signs, acquired the certainty that the murderer could be none other than one of the countess's servants. Lastly, I saw that, if I was to have the pearl, the man must be arrested—and so I left the waistcoat-button—but that there must not be any irrefutable proofs of his guilt—and so I picked up the knife which he had left on the carpet, took away the key which he had left in the lock, locked the door and removed the finger-marks on the plaster of the wardrobe-closet. In my opinion, this was one of those flashes . . ."

"Of genius," I put in.

"Of genius, if you like, which would not have lit up the brain of the first-comer. I hit, in one second, upon the two terms of the problem—an arrest and an acquittal—and made use of the formidable apparatus of the law to unsettle my man, stupefy and reduce him to such a condition of mind that once free, he must inevitably fall into the rather clumsy trap which I had laid for him! . . .”

“Rather clumsy? I should say, very! For he ran no danger.”

“Poor devil! . . .”

“Poor devil? . . . Victor Danègre? . . . You forget that he’s a murderer! It would have been a most immoral thing to leave the black pearl in his possession. Why, he’s alive! Just think, Danègre’s alive!”

“And the black pearl is yours.”

He took it from one of the secret compartments of his pocket-book, examined it with loving fingers and earnest eyes and sighed:

“What Russian prince, what vain and idiot rajah will become the owner of this treasure? What American millionaire is destined to possess this morsel of beauty and luxury which once adorned the white shoulders of Léontine Zalti, Comtesse d’Andillot? Who can tell? . . .”

HOLMLOCK SHEARS ARRIVES TOO LATE

HOLMLOCK SHEARS ARRIVES TOO LATE

"It's really curious, your likeness to Arsène Lupin, my dear Vermont!"

"Do you know him?"

"Oh, just as everybody does, by his photographs, not one of which in the least resembles the others, but they all leave the impression of the same face . . . which is undoubtedly yours."

Horace Vermont seemed rather annoyed: "I suppose you're right, Devanne. You're not the first to tell me of it, believe me."

"Upon my word," persisted Devanne, "if you had not been introduced to me by my cousin d'Estevan, and if you were not the well-known painter whose charming sea-pieces I admire so much, I'm not sure but that I should have informed the police of your presence at Dieppe."

The sally was received with general laughter. There were gathered, in the great dining-room at Thibermesnil Castle, in addition to Vermont, the Abbé Gélis, rector of the village, and a dozen officers whose regiments were taking part in the manœuvres in the neighbourhood and who had accepted the invitation of Georges Devanne, the banker, and his mother. One of them exclaimed:

"But, I say, wasn't Arsène Lupin seen on the coast after his famous performance in the train between Paris and Le Havre?"

"Just so, three months ago; and the week after that, I made the acquaintance at the Casino, of our friend Vermont here, who has since honoured me with a few visits: an agreeable preliminary to a more serious call which he means to pay me one of these days . . . or, rather, one of these nights!"

The company laughed once more and moved into the old guard-room, a huge, lofty hall which occupies the whole of the lower portion of the Tour Guillaume and in which Georges Devanne had arranged all the incomparable treasures accumulated through the centuries by the lords of Thibermesnil. It is filled and adorned with old chests and credence-tables, fire-dogs and candelabra. Splendid tapestries hang on the stone walls. The deep embrasures of the four windows are furnished with seats and end in pointed casements with leaded panes. Between the door and the window on the left stands a monumental Renaissance bookcase, on the pediment of which is inscribed, in gold letters, the word "THIBERMESNIL" and, underneath it, the proud motto of the family : "Fais ce que veux."

And, as they were lighting their cigars, Devanne added :

"But you will have to hurry, Vermont, for this is the last night on which you will have a chance."

"And why the last night?" asked the painter, who was certainly taking the jest in very good part.

Devanne was about to reply, when his mother made signs to him. But the excitement of the dinner and the wish to interest his guests were too much for him :

"Pooh!" he muttered. "Why shouldn't I tell them? There's no indiscretion to be feared now."

They sat round him, filled with a lively curiosity, and he declared, with the self-satisfied air of a man announcing a great piece of news :

"To-morrow, at four o'clock in the afternoon, I shall have here, as my guest, Holmlock Shears, the great English detective, for whom no mystery exists, the most extraordinary solver of riddles that was ever known, the wonderful being who might have been the creation of a novelist's brain."

There was a general exclamation. Holmlock Shears at Thibermesnil! The thing was serious then? Was Arsène Lupin really in the district?

"Arsène Lupin and his gang are not far away. Without counting Baron Cahorn's mishap, to whom are we to ascribe the burglaries at Montigny and Bruchet and Crasville, if not to our national thief? To-day it's my turn."

"And have you had a warning, like Baron Cahorn?"

"The same trick does not succeed twice."

"Then . . . ?"

"Look here."

He rose, and, pointing to a little empty space between two tall folios on one of the shelves of the bookcase, said :

"There was a book here, a sixteenth-century book, entitled 'The Chronicles of Thibermesnil,' which was the history of the castle from the time of its construction by Duke Rollo, on the site of a feudal fortress. It contained three engraved plates. One of them presented a general view of the domain as a whole; the second a plan of the building; and the third—I call your special attention to this—the sketch of an underground passage, one of whose outlets opens beyond the first line of the ramparts, while the other ends here, yes, in this very hall where we are now sitting. Now this book disappeared last month."

"By Jove!" said Velmont. "That looks bad. Only it's not enough to justify the intervention of Holmlock Shears."

"Certainly, it would not have been enough, if another fact had not come to give its full significance to that which I have just told you. There was a second copy of the chronicle in the Bibliothèque Nationale, and the two copies differed in certain details concerning the underground passage, such as the addition of a sectional drawing, and a scale and various notes, not printed, but written in ink and more or less obliterated. I knew of these particulars and I knew that the definite line of the passage could only be reconstructed by carefully collating the two plans. Well, on the day after that on which my copy disappeared, the one in the Bibliothèque Nationale was applied for by a reader, who carried it off without leaving any clue as to the manner in which the theft was effected."

These words were greeted with exclamations :

"This time, the case grows serious."

"Yes; and this time," said Devanne, "the police were roused and there was a double enquiry, which, however, led to no result."

"Like all those aimed at Arsène Lupin."

"Exactly. It then occurred to me to write and ask for the help of Holmlock Shears, who replied that nothing would please him more than to come into contact with Arsène Lupin."

"What an honour for Arsène Lupin!" said Velmont. "But, if our national thief, as you call him, should not be contemplating a project upon Thibermesnil, then there will be nothing for Holmlock Shears to do but twiddle his thumbs."

"There is another matter, which is sure to interest him: the discovery of the underground passage."

"Why, you told us that one end opened in the fields and the other here, in the guard-room!"

"Yes, but in what part of it? The line that represents the tunnel on the plans finishes, at one end, at a little circle accompanied by the initials T. G., which, of course, stand for Tour Guillaume. But it's a round tower; and who can decide at which point in the circle the line in the drawing touches?"

Devanne lit a second cigar and poured himself out a glass of benedictine. The others pressed him with questions. He smiled with pleasure at the interest which he had aroused. At last he said:

"The secret is lost. Not a person in the world knows it. The story says that the high and mighty lords handed it down to one another, on their death-bed, from father to son, until the day when Geoffrey, the last of the name, lost his head on the scaffold, on the seventh of Thermidor, Year Second, in the nineteenth year of his age."

"But more than a century has passed since then; and someone must have looked for it?"

"It has been looked for, but in vain. I myself, after I bought the castle from the great-grand-nephew of Leribourg of the National Convention, had excavations made. What was the good? Remember that this tower is surrounded by water on every side and only joined to the castle by a bridge, and that, consequently, the tunnel must pass under the old moats. The plan in the Bibliothèque Nationale shows a series of four staircases, comprising forty-eight steps, which allows for a depth of over ten yards. And the scale annexed to the other plan fixes the length at two hundred yards. As a matter of fact, the whole problem lies here, between the floor, the ceiling and the walls. And, upon my word, I do not feel inclined to pull them down."

"And is there no clue?"

"Not one."

The Abbé Gélis objected :

"Monsieur Devanne, we have to reckon with two quotations . . . "

"Oh," cried Devanne, laughing, "the rector is a great rummager among family-papers, a great reader of memoirs; and he loves anything connected with Thibermesnil. But the explanation to which he refers only serves to confuse matters."

"But tell us what it is."

"Do you really care to hear?"

"Immensely."

"Well, you must know that, as the result of his reading, he has discovered that two kings of France held the key to the riddle."

"Two kings of France?"

"Henry IV and Louis XVI."

"Two famous men. And how did the rector find out?"

"Oh, it's very simple," continued Devanne. "Two days before the battle of Arques, King Henry IV came to sup and sleep in the castle; and, on this occasion, Duke Edgar confided the family-secret to him. This secret Henry IV revealed later to Sully, his minister, who tells the story in his 'Royales Œconomies d'Etat,' without adding any comment but this incomprehensible phrase: 'La hache tournoie dans l'air qui frémit, mais l'aile s'ouvre et l'on va jusqu' à Dieu.'"

A silence followed and Vermont sneered :

"It's not as clear as daylight, is it?"

"That's what I say. The rector maintains that Sully set down the key to the puzzle by means of those words, without betraying the secret to the scribes to whom he dictated his memoirs."

"It's an ingenious supposition."

"True. But what is it the axe that turns? What bird is it whose wing opens?"

"And who goes to God?"

"Goodness knows!"

"And what about our good King Louis XVI?" asked Vermont.

"Louis XVI stayed at Thibermesnil in 1784; and the famous iron cupboard discovered at the Louvre on the information of Gamain, the locksmith, contained a paper with these words written in the king's hand: 'Thibermesnil, 2-6-12'."

Horace Vermont laughed aloud:

"Victory! The darkness is dispelled. Twice six are twelve!"

"Laugh as you please, sir," said the rector. "Those two quotations contain the solution, for all that; and, one of these days, someone will come along who knows how to interpret them."

"Holmlock Shears, first of all," said Devanne. "Unless Arsène Lupin forestalls him. What do you say, Vermont?"

Vermont rose, laid his hand on Devanne's shoulder and declared:

"I say that the data supplied by your book and by the copy in the Bibliothèque Nationale lacked just one link of the highest importance and that you have been kind enough to supply me with it. I am much obliged to you."

"Well?"

"Well, now that the axe has turned and the bird has flown and that twice six are twelve, all I have to do is to set to work."

"Without losing a minute."

"Without losing a second! You see, I must rob your castle to-night, that is to say before Holmlock Shears arrives."

"You're quite right : you have only just got time. Would you like me to drive you?"

"To Dieppe?"

"Yes, I may as well fetch Monsieur and Madame d'Androl and a girl friend of theirs, who are arriving by the midnight train."

Then, turning to the officers :

"We shall all meet here at lunch to-morrow, shan't we, gentlemen? I rely upon you, for the castle is to be invested by your regiments and taken by assault at eleven in the morning."

The invitation was accepted, the officers took their leave and, a minute later, a 30-h.p. motor-car was carrying Devanne and Velmont along the road to Dieppe. Devanne dropped the painter at the Casino and went on to the station.

His friends arrived at midnight; and, at half-past twelve, the car passed through the gates of Thibermesnil. At one o'clock, after a light supper served in the drawing-room, every one went to bed. The lights were extinguished one by one. The deep silence of the night enshrouded the castle.

But the moon pierced the clouds that veiled it and, through two of the windows, filled the hall with the light of its white beams. This lasted for but a moment. Soon, the moon was hidden behind the curtain of the hills and all was darkness. The silence increased as the shadows thickened. At most, it was disturbed, from time to time, by the creaking of the furniture or the rustling of the reeds in the pond which bathes the old walls with its green waters.

The clock told the endless beads of its seconds. It struck two. Then, once more, the seconds fell hastily and monotonously in the heavy stillness of the night. Then three struck.

And, suddenly, something gave a clash, like the arm of a railway-signal that drops as a train passes. And a thin streak of light crossed the hall from one end to the other, like an arrow leaving a glittering track behind it. It issued from the central groove of a pilaster against which the pediment of the bookcase rests upon the right. It first lingered upon the opposite panel in a dazzling circle, next wandered on every side like a restless glance searching the darkness and then faded away, only to appear once more while the whole of one section of the bookcase turned upon its axis and revealed a wide opening, shaped like a vault.

A man entered, holding an electric lantern in his hand. Another man and a third emerged carrying a coil of rope and different implements. The first man looked round the room, listened and said :

“Call the pals.”

Eight of these pals came out of the underground passage, eight strapping fellows, with determined faces. And the removal began.

It did not take long. Arsène Lupin passed from one piece of furniture to another, examined it and, according to its size or its artistic value, spared it or gave an order :

“Take it away.”

And the piece in question was removed, swallowed by the yawning mouth of the tunnel and sent down into the bowels of the earth.

And thus were juggled away six Louis XV arm-chairs and as many occasional chairs, a number of Aubusson tapestries, some candelabra signed by Gouthière, two Fragonards and a Nattier, a bust by Houdon and some statuettes. At times Arsène Lupin would stop before a magnificent oak chest or a splendid picture and sigh :

“That’s too heavy . . . Too big . . . What a pity !”

And he would continue his expert survey.

In forty minutes, the hall was “cleared,” to use Arsène’s expression. And all this was accomplished in an admirably orderly manner, without the least noise, as though all the objects which the men were handling had been wrapped in thick wadding.

To the last man who was leaving, carrying a clock signed by Boule, he said :

“You needn’t come back. You understand, don’t you, that, as soon as the motor-van is loaded, you’re to make for the barn at Roquefort?”

"What about yourself, governor?"

"Leave me the motor-cycle."

When the man had gone, he pushed the movable section of the bookcase back into its place and, after clearing away the traces of the removal and the footmarks, he raised a curtain and entered a gallery which served as a communication between the tower and the castle. Half-way down the gallery stood a glass case; and it was because of this case that Arsène Lupin had continued his investigations.

It contained marvels: a unique collection of watches, snuff-boxes, rings, chatelaines, miniatures of the most exquisite workmanship. He forced the lock with a jemmy; and it was an unspeakable pleasure to him to finger those gems of gold and silver, those precious and dainty little works of art.

Hanging round his neck was a large canvas bag, specially contrived to hold these windfalls. He filled it. He also filled the pockets of his jacket, waistcoat and trousers. And he was stuffing under his left arm a heap of those pearl reticules beloved of our ancestors and so eagerly sought after by our present fashion . . . when a slight sound fell upon his ear.

He listened: he was not mistaken; the noise became clearer.

And, suddenly, he remembered: at the end of the gallery, an inner staircase led to a room which had hitherto been unoccupied, but which had been allotted that evening to the young girl whom Devanne had gone to meet at Dieppe with his friends the d'Androls.

With a quick movement, he pressed the spring of his lantern and extinguished it. He had just time to hide in the recess of a window, when the door at the top of the staircase opened and the gallery was lit by a faint gleam.

He had a feeling—for, half-hidden behind a curtain, he could not see—that a figure was cautiously descending the top stairs. He hoped that it would come no further. It continued, however, and took several steps into the gallery. But it gave a cry. It must have caught sight of the broken case, three-quarters emptied of its contents.

By the scent he recognised the presence of a woman. Her dress almost touched the curtain that concealed him and he seemed to hear her heart beating, while she must needs herself perceive the presence of another person, behind her, in the dark, within reach of her hand. He said to himself :

“She’s frightened . . . she’ll go back . . . she is bound to go back.”

She did not go back. The candle shaking in her hand became steadier. She turned round, hesitated for a moment, appeared to be listening to the alarming silence and then, with a sudden movement, pulled back the curtain.

Their eyes met.

Arsène murmured, in confusion :

“You . . . you . . . Miss Underdown !”

It was Nellie Underdown, the passenger on the Provence, the girl who had mingled her dreams with his during that never-to-be-forgotten crossing, who had witnessed his arrest and who, rather than betray him, had generously flung into the sea the Kodak in which he had hidden the stolen jewels and bank-notes! . . . It was Nellie Underdown, the dear, sweet girl whose image had so often saddened or gladdened his long hours spent in prison !

So extraordinary was their chance meeting, in this castle and at that hour of the night, that they did not stir, did not utter a word, dumbfounded and as it were hypnotised by the fantastic apparition which each of them presented to the other’s eyes.

Nellie, shattered with emotion, staggered to a seat.

He remained standing in front of her. And, gradually, as the interminable seconds passed, he became aware of the impression which he must be making at that moment, with his arms loaded with curiosities, his pockets stuffed, his bag filled to bursting. A great sense of confusion overcame him and he blushed to find himself there, in the mean plight of a robber caught in the act. To her, henceforth, come what might, he was the thief, the man who puts his hand into other men’s pockets, the man who picks locks and enters doors by stealth.

One of the watches rolled upon the carpet, followed by another. And more things fell from under his arms, which were unable to retain them. Then, quickly making up his mind, he dropped a part of his booty into a chair, emptied his pockets and slipped off his bag.

He now felt easier in Nellie's presence and took a step towards her, with the intention of speaking to her. But she made a movement of recoil and rose quickly, as though seized with fright, and ran to the guard-room. The curtain fell behind her. He followed her. She stood there, trembling and speechless, and her eyes gazed with terror upon the great devastated hall.

Without a moment's hesitation, he said :

"At three o'clock to-morrow, everything shall be restored to its place. . . . The things shall be brought back. . . ."

She did not reply, and he repeated :

"At three o'clock to-morrow, I give you my solemn pledge . . . No power on earth shall prevent me from keeping my promise . . . At three o'clock to-morrow. . . ."

A long silence weighed upon them both. He dared not break it; and the girl's emotion made him suffer in every nerve. Softly, without a word, he moved away.

And he thought to himself :

"She must go! . . . She must feel that she is free to go! . . . She must not be afraid of me! . . ."

But, suddenly, she started and stammered :

"Hark! . . . Footsteps! . . . I hear someone coming . . ."

He looked at her in surprise. She appeared distraught, as though at the approach of danger.

"I hear nothing," he said, "and, even so . . ."

"Why, you must fly! . . . Quick, fly! . . ."

"Fly? . . . Why?"

"You must! . . . You must! . . . Ah, don't stay! . . ."

She rushed to the entrance to the gallery and listened. No, there was no one there. Perhaps the sound had come from the outside. . . . She waited a second and then, reassured, turned round.

Arsène Lupin was gone.

Devanne's first thought, on ascertaining that his castle had been pillaged, found expression in the words which he spoke to himself :

"This is Velmont's work and Velmont is none other than Arsène Lupin."

All was explained by this means and nothing could be explained by any other. And yet the idea only just passed through his mind, for it seemed almost impossible that Velmont should not be Velmont, that is to say, the well-known painter, the club friend of his cousin d'Estevan. And, when the sergeant of gendarmes had been sent for and arrived, Devanne did not even think of telling him of this absurd conjecture.

The whole of that morning was spent, at Thibermesnil, in an indescribable hubbub. The gendarmes, the rural police, the commissary of police from Dieppe, the inhabitants of the village thronged the passages, the park, the approaches to the castle. The arrival of the troops taking part in the manœuvres and the crack of the rifles added to the picturesqueness of the scene.

The early investigations furnished no clue. The windows had not been broken nor the doors smashed in. There was no doubt that the removal had been effected through the secret outlet. And yet there was no trace of footsteps on the carpet, no unusual mark upon the walls.

There was one unexpected thing, however, which clearly pointed to the fanciful methods of Arsène Lupin : the famous sixteenth-century chronicle had been restored to its old place in the book-case and, beside it, stood a similar volume, which was none other than the copy stolen from the Bibliothèque Nationale.

The officers arrived at eleven. Devanne received them gaily : however annoyed he might feel at the loss of his artistic treasures, his fortune was large enough to enable him to bear it without showing ill-humour. His friends the d'Androls and Nellie Underdown came down from their rooms and the officers were introduced.

One of the guests was missing : Horace Velmont. Was he not coming? His absence would have revived Georges Devanne's suspicions. But he walked in upon the stroke of twelve and Devanne exclaimed :

"Good! There you are at last!"

"Am I late?"

"No; but you might have been . . . after such an exciting night! You have heard the news, I suppose?"

"What news?"

"You robbed the castle last night!"

"Nonsense!"

"I tell you, you did. But give your arm to Miss Underdown and let us go in to lunch. . . . Miss Underdown, allow me to introduce . . ."

He stopped, struck by the confusion on the girl's features. Then, seized with a sudden recollection, he said :

"By the way, of course, you once travelled on the same ship with Arsène Lupin . . . before his arrest . . . You are surprised by the likeness, are you not?"

She did not reply. Vermont stood before her smiling. He bowed; she took his arm. He led her to her place and sat down opposite her. . . .

During lunch they talked of nothing but Arsène Lupin, the stolen furniture, the underground passage and Holmlock Shears. Not until the end of the meal, when other subjects were broached, did Vermont join in the conversation. He was amusing and serious, eloquent and witty by turns. And whatever he said he appeared to say with the sole object of interesting the girl. She, wholly engrossed in her own thoughts, seemed not to hear him.

Coffee was served on the terrace overlooking the courtyard and the French garden in front of the castle. The regimental band played on the lawn and a crowd of peasants and soldiers strolled about the walks in the park.

Nellie was thinking of Arsène Lupin's promise :

"At three o'clock, everything shall be restored to its place, I give you my solemn pledge."

At three o'clock! And the hands of the great clock in the right wing pointed to twenty to three. In spite of herself, she kept looking at it. And she also looked at Velmont, who was swinging peacefully in a comfortable rocking-chair.

Ten minutes to three . . . five minutes to three . . . A sort of impatience, mingled with a sense of exquisite pain, racked the young girl's mind. Was it possible for the miracle to be accomplished and to be accomplished at the fixed time, when the castle, the courtyard and the country around were filled with people and when, at that very moment, the public prosecutor and the examining magistrate were pursuing their investigations?

And still . . . still, Arsène Lupin had given such a solemn promise!

"It will happen just as he said," she thought, impressed by all the man's energy, authority and certainty.

And it seemed to her no longer a miracle, but a natural event that was bound to take place in the ordinary course of things.

For a second, their eyes met. She blushed and turned her head away.

Three o'clock . . . The first stroke rang out; the second; the third . . . Horace Velmont took out his watch, glanced up at the clock and put his watch back in his pocket. A few seconds elapsed. And then the crowd opened out around the lawn to make way for two vehicles that had just passed through the park-gates, each drawn by two horses. They were two of those regimental waggons which carry the cooking-utensils of the officers' mess and the soldiers' kits. They stopped in front of the steps. A quarter-master sergeant jumped down from the box of the first waggon and asked for M. Devanne.

Devanne ran down the steps. Under the awnings, carefully packed and wrapped up, were his pictures, his furniture, his works of art of all kinds.

The sergeant replied to the questions put to him by producing the order which the adjutant on duty had given him and which the adjutant himself had received that morning in the orderly-room. The order stated that No. 2 company of the fourth battalion was to see that the goods and chattels deposited at the Halleux cross-roads, in the Forest of Arques, were delivered at three o'clock to M. Georges Devanne, the owner of Thibermesnil Castle. It bore the signature of Colonel Beauvel.

"I found everything ready for us at the cross-roads," added the sergeant, "laid out on the grass, under the charge of . . . any one passing. That struck me as queer, but, well, sir, the order was plain enough!"

One of the officers examined the signature: it was a perfect copy, but forged.

The band had stopped. The waggons were emptied and the furniture carried indoors.

In the midst of this excitement, Nellie Underdown was left standing alone at one end of the terrace. She was grave and anxious, full of vague thoughts, which she did not seek to formulate. Suddenly she saw Vermont coming up to her. She wished to avoid him, but the corner of the balustrade that borders the terrace hemmed her in on two sides and a row of tubs filled with different shrubs—orange-trees, laurels and bamboos—left her no other way of escape than that by which Vermont was approaching. She did not move. A ray of sunlight quivered on her golden hair, shaken by the frail leaves of a bamboo-plant. She heard a soft voice say:

"I have kept the promise I made you last night."

Arsène Lupin stood by her side and there was no one else near.

He repeated, in a hesitating attitude and a timid voice:

"I have kept the promise I made you last night."

He expected a word of thanks, a gesture at least to prove the interest which she took in his action. She was silent.

Her scorn irritated Arsène Lupin and, at the same time, he received a profound sense of all that separated him from Nellie now that she knew the truth. He would have liked to exonerate himself, to seek excuses, to show his life in its bolder and greater aspects. But the words jarred upon him, before they were uttered; and he felt the absurdity and the impertinence of any explanation. Then, overcome by a flood of recollections, he murmured sadly:

"How distant the past seems! Do you remember the long hours on the deck of the Provence? . . . Ah, stay . . . one day. you had a rose in your hand, as you have to-day, a pale rose, like this one . . . I asked you for it . . . you seemed not to hear. . . . However, when you had gone below, I found the rose . . . you had dropped it, no doubt . . . I have kept it ever since . . ."

She still made no reply. She seemed very far from him. He continued :

"For the sake of those dear hours, forget what you have learnt. Let the past be joined with the present! Let me be not the man whom you saw last night, but your fellow-passenger on that voyage! Turn your eyes and let them look at me, if only for a second, as they looked at me then . . . I implore you . . . Am I not the same man that I was?"

She raised her eyes, as he asked, and looked at him. Then, without a word, she placed her finger on a ring which he wore on his right hand. Only the circlet was visible, but the bezel, turned inwards, was formed of a wonderful ruby.

Arsène Lupin blushed scarlet. The ring belonged to Georges Devanne.

He gave a bitter smile :

"You are right," he said. "What has been always will be. Arsène Lupin is and can be no one but Arsène Lupin; and not even a memory can exist between you and him . . . Forgive me . . . I ought to have understood that my very presence beside you is an outrage . . ."

He made way for her, hat in hand, and Nellie passed before him along the balustrade. He felt tempted to hold her back, to beseech her. His courage failed him and he followed her with his eyes, as he had done on the day long past when she crossed the gangway on their arrival at New York. She went up the steps leading to the door. For another instant, her dainty figure was outlined against the marble of the entrance-hall. Then he saw her no more.

A cloud covered the sun. Arsène Lupin stood motionless, gazing at the little footprints in the sand. Suddenly, he gave a start : on the edge of the bamboo tub against which Nellie had leant lay the rose, the pale pink rose for which he had not dared to ask her . . . This one, too, had been dropped, no doubt. But dropped by accident or intention?

He seized it eagerly. Some of the petals fell off. He picked them up, one by one, as though they were relics. . . .

"Come," he said to himself, "I have nothing more to do here. Let us see to our retreat. The more so as the place may become too hot to hold me, once Holmlock Shears takes the matter up."

The park was deserted, save for a group of gendarmes standing near the lodge at the entrance. Lupin plunged into the copse, scaled the wall and took the nearest way to the station, a path winding through the fields. He had been walking for eight or nine minutes when the road narrowed, boxed in between two slopes; and, as he reached this pass, he saw someone enter it at the opposite end.

It was a man of, perhaps, some fifty summers, pretty powerfully built and clean-shaven, whose dress accentuated his foreign appearance. He carried a heavy walking-stick in his hand and a travelling-bag slung over his shoulder.

The two men crossed each other. The stranger asked, in a hardly perceptible English accent:

"Excuse me, sir . . . am I going right for the castle?"

"Keep straight on and turn to the left when you come to the foot of the wall. They are waiting for you impatiently."

"Oh?"

"Yes, my friend Devanne announced your visit to us last night."

"He made a great mistake if he said too much."

"And I am happy to be the first to greet you. Holmlock Shears has no more fervent admirer than myself."

There was the slightest shade of irony in his voice, which he regretted forthwith, for Holmlock Shears took a view of him from head to foot with an eye at once so all-embracing and so piercing that Arsène Lupin felt himself seized, caught and registered by that glance more exactly and more essentially than he had ever been by any photographic apparatus.

"The snapshot's taken," he thought. "It will never be worth my while to disguise myself when this joker is about. Only . . . did he recognise me or not?"

They exchanged bows. But a noise of hoofs rang out, the clinking sound of horses trotting along the road. It was the gendarmes. The two men had to fall back against the slope, in the tall grass, to save themselves from being knocked over. The gendarmes passed, and as they were riding in single file, at a certain distance each from the other, this took some time. Lupin thought:

"It all depends upon whether he recognised me. If so, there is every chance of his abusing the situation. It's an agonising problem . . ."

When the last horseman had passed, Holmlock Shears drew himself up and, without saying a word, brushed the dust from his clothes. The strap of his bag had caught in a branch of thorns. Arsène Lupin hastened to release him. They looked at each other for another second. And, if any one could have surprised them at that moment he would have beheld a stimulating sight in the first meeting of these two men, both so out of the common, so powerfully armed, both really superior characters and inevitably destined by their special aptitudes to come into collision, like two equal forces which the order of things drives one against the other in space.

Then the Englishman said:

"I am much obliged to you."

"At your service," replied Lupin.

They went their respective ways, Lupin to the station, Holmlock Shears to the castle.

The examining magistrate and the public prosecutor had left, after a long, but fruitless investigation, and the others were waiting for Holmlock Shears with an amount of curiosity justified by his reputation. They were a little disappointed by his very ordinary appearance, which was so different from the picture which they had formed of him. There was nothing of the novel-hero about him, nothing of the enigmatic and diabolical personality which the idea of Holmlock Shears evokes in us. However, Devanne exclaimed, with exuberant delight :

"So you have come at last! This is indeed a joy! I have so long been hoping . . . I am almost glad of what has happened, since it gives me the pleasure of seeing you. But, by the way, how did you come?"

"By train."

"What a pity! Why, I sent my motor to the landing-stage to meet you!"

"An official arrival, I suppose," growled the Englishman, "with a brass band marching ahead! A first-rate way to make my business easy for me."

This uninviting tone disconcerted Devanne who, making an effort to jest, retorted :

"The business, fortunately, is easier than I wrote you."

"Why?"

"Because the burglary took place last night."

"If you had not announced my visit beforehand, the burglary would probably not have taken place last night."

"When would it?"

"To-morrow or some other day."

"And then?"

"Arsène Lupin would have been caught in a trap."

"And my things . . . ?"

"Would not have been carried off."

"My things are here."

"Here?"

"They were brought back at three o'clock."

"By Lupin?"

"By a quarter-master sergeant, in two military waggons!"

Holmlock Shears violently thrust his cap down upon his head, and adjusted his bag; but Devanne, in a fever of excitement, exclaimed :

"What are you doing?"

"I am going."

"Why should you?"

"Your things are here. Arsène Lupin is gone. There is nothing left for me to do."

"Why, my dear sir, I simply can't get on without you. What happened last night may be repeated to-morrow, seeing that we know nothing of the most important point: how Arsène Lupin effected his entrance, how he left and why, a few hours later, he proceeded to restore what he had stolen."

"Oh, I see: you don't know . . ."

The idea of a secret to be discovered mollified Holmlock Shears.

"Very well, let's look into it. But at once, please, and, as far as possible, alone."

The phrase clearly referred to the bystanders. Devanne took the hint and led the Englishman into the guard-room. Shears put a number of questions to him touching the previous evening, the guests who were present and the inmates and frequenters of the castle. He next examined the two volumes of the Chronicle, compared the plans for the underground passage, made Devanne repeat the two sentences noted down by the Abbé Gélis and asked:

"You're sure it was yesterday that you first spoke of those two quotations?"

"Yesterday."

"You had never mentioned them to Monsieur Horace Velmont?"

"Never."

"Very well. You might order your car. I shall leave in an hour."

"In an hour?"

"Arsène Lupin took no longer to solve the problem which you put to him."

"I? . . . Which I put to him? . . ."

"Why, yes, Arsène Lupin or Velmont, it's all the same."

"I thought as much . . . Oh, the rascal! . . ."

"Well, at ten o'clock last night, you supplied Lupin with the facts which he lacked and which he had been seeking for weeks. And, during the course of the night, Lupin found time to grasp those facts, to collect his gang and rob you of your property. I lay claim to being quite as expeditious."

He walked from one end of the room to the other, thinking as he went, then sat down, crossed his long legs, and closed his eyes.

Devanne waited in some perplexity:

"Is he asleep? Is he thinking?"

In any case, he went out to give his orders. When he returned, he found the Englishman on his knees at the foot of the staircase in the gallery, examining the carpet:

"What's the matter?"

"Look at these candle-stains . . ."

"I see . . . they are quite fresh . . ."

"And you will find others at the top of the stairs and more still around this glass case which Arsène Lupin broke open and from which he removed the curiosities and placed them on this chair."

"And what do you conclude?"

"Nothing. All these facts would no doubt explain the restitution which he effected. But that is a side of the question into which I have no time to go. The essential thing is the direction of the underground passage."

"You still hope? . . ."

"I don't hope; I know. There's a chapel at two or three hundred yards from the castle, is there not?"

"Yes, a ruined chapel, with the tomb of Duke Rollo."

"Tell your chauffeur to wait for us near the chapel."

"My chauffeur is not back yet . . . They are to let me know. . . . So, I see, you consider that the underground passage ends at the chapel. What indication . . .?"

Holmlock Shears interrupted him:

"May I ask you to get me a lantern and a ladder?"

"Oh, you want a lantern and a ladder?"

"I suppose so, or I wouldn't ask for them."

Devanne, a little taken aback by this cold logic, rang the bell. The ladder and the lantern were brought.

Orders now succeeded one another with the strictness and precision of military commands :

“Put the ladder against the bookcase, to the left of the word ‘Thibermesnil’”

Devanne did as he was told and the Englishman continued :

“More to the left . . . to the right . . . Stop! . . . Now go up . . . Good . . . The letters are all in relief, are they not?”

“Yes.”

“Catch hold of the letter H and tell me whether it turns in either direction.”

Devanne grasped the letter H and exclaimed :

“Yes, it turns! A quarter of a circle to the right! How did you discover that?”

Shears, without replying, continued :

“Can you reach the letter R from where you stand? Yes, I see you can . . . Move it about, as you would a bolt which you were pushing or drawing.”

Devanne moved the letter R. To his great astonishment, something became unlatched inside.

“Just so,” said Holmlock Shears. “All that you now have to do is to push your ladder to the other end, that is to say, to the end of the word ‘Thibermesnil’ . . . Good . . . Now, if I’m not mistaken, if things go as they should, the letter L will open like a shutter.”

With a certain solemnity, Devanne took hold of the letter L. The letter L opened, but Devanne tumbled off his ladder, for the whole section of the bookcase comprised between the first and last letters of the word swung round upon a pivot and disclosed the opening of the tunnel.

Holmlock Shears asked, phlegmatically :

“Have you hurt yourself?”

“No, no,” said Devanne, scrambling to his feet, “I’m not hurt, but flurried I admit . . . Those moving letters . . . that yawning tunnel”

“And what then? Doesn’t it all fit in exactly with the Sully quotation?”

"How do you mean?"

"Why, of course: l'H tournoie, l'R frémit, et L' s'ouvre . . ."*

"But what about Louis XVI?"

"Louis XVI was a really capable locksmith. I remember reading a 'Treatise on Combination-locks' which was ascribed to him. On the part of a Thibermesnil, it would be an act of good courtiership to show his sovereign this masterpiece of mechanism. By way of a memorandum, the king wrote down, '2—6—12,' that is to say, the second, sixth and twelfth letters of the word: H, R, L."

"Oh, splendid! . . . I am beginning to understand . . . Only, look here . . . I can see how you get out of this room, but I can't see how Lupin got in. For, remember, he came from the outside."

Holmlock Shears lit the lantern and entered the underground passage:

"Look, you can see the whole mechanism here, like the works of a watch, and all the letters are reversed. Lupin, therefore, had only to move them from this side of the wall."

"What proof have you?"

"What proof? Look at this splash of oil. He even foresaw that the wheels would need greasing," said Shears, not without admiration.

"Then he knew the other outlet?"

"Just as I know it. Follow me."

"Into the underground passage?"

"Are you afraid?"

"No, but are you sure you can find your way?"

"I'll find it with my eyes shut."

They first went down twelve steps, then twelve more and again twice twelve more. Then they passed through a long tunnel whose brick walls showed traces of successive restorations, and oozed, in places, with moisture. The ground underfoot was damp.

"We are passing under the pond," said Devanne, who felt far from comfortable.

The tunnel ended in a flight of twelve steps, followed by three other flights of twelve steps each, which they climbed with difficulty, and they emerged in a small hollow hewn out of the solid rock. The way did not go any further.

"Hang it all!" muttered Holmlock Shears. "Nothing but bare walls. This is a nuisance."

"Suppose we go back," suggested Devanne. "What's the use of looking for more? I have seen all I want to."

But, on raising his eyes, the Englishman gave a sigh of relief: above their heads, the same mechanism was repeated as at the entrance. He had only to work the three letters. A block of granite turned on a pivot. On the other side, it formed Duke Rollo's tombstone, carved with the twelve letters in relief, "Thibermesnil". And they found themselves in the little ruined chapel of which Holmlock Shears had spoken.

"'And you go to God' . . . that is to say, to the chapel," said Shears, quoting the end of the sentence.

"Is it possible," cried Devanne, amazed at the other's perspicacity and keenness, "is it possible that this simple clue told you all that you wanted to know?"

"Tush!" said the Englishman. "It was even superfluous. In the copy belonging to the Bibliothèque Nationale, the drawing of the tunnel ends on the left, as you know, in a circle, and on the right, as you do not know, in a little cross, which is so faintly marked that it can only be seen through a magnifying-glass. This cross obviously points to the chapel."

Poor Devanne could not believe his ears: "It's wonderful, marvellous, and yet as simple as A B C! How is it that nobody ever saw through the mystery?"

"Because nobody ever united the three or four necessary elements, that is to say, the two books and the quotations . . . Nobody, except Arsène Lupin and myself."

"But I also," said Devanne, "and the Abbé Gélis . . . We both of us knew as much about it as you and, nevertheless . . ."

Shears smiled :

"Monsieur Devanne, it is not given to all the world to succeed in solving riddles."

"But I have been hunting for ten years. And you, in ten minutes . . ."

"Pooh ! It's a matter of habit . . ."

They walked out of the chapel and the Englishman exclaimed :

"Hullo, a motor-car waiting !"

"Why, it's mine !"

"Yours ? But I thought the chauffeur hadn't returned ?"

"No more he had . . . I can't make it out . . ."

They went up to the car and Devanne said to the chauffeur :

"Victor, who told you to come here ?"

"Monsieur Velmont, sir," replied the man.

"Monsieur Velmont ? Did you meet him ?"

"Yes, sir, near the station, and he told me to go to the chapel."

"To go to the chapel ! What for ?"

"To wait for you, sir . . . and your friend."

Devanne and Holmlock Shears exchanged glances. Devanne said :

"He saw that the riddle would be child's play to you. It's a delicate compliment."

A smile of satisfaction passed over the detective's thin lips. The compliment pleased him. He jerked his head and said :

"He's a man that ! I took his measure the moment I saw him."

"So you've seen him."

"We passed each other just now."

"And you knew that he was Horace Velmont, I mean to say, Arsène Lupin ?"

"No, but it did not take me long to guess as much . . . from a certain irony in his talk."

"And you let him escape?"

"I did . . . although I had only to put out my hand . . . five gendarmes rode past us."

"But, bless my soul, you'll never find an opportunity like that again . . ."

"Just so, Monsieur Devanne," said the Englishman, haughtily. "When, Holmlock Shears is dealing with an adversary like Arsène Lupin, he does not take the opportunities he finds . . . he creates opportunities . . ."

But time was pressing; and, as Lupin had been so obliging as to send the motor, Devanne and Shears settled themselves in their seats. Victor started the engine and they drove off. Fields, clumps of trees, sped past. The gentle undulations of the Caux country levelled out before them. Suddenly, Devanne's eyes were attracted to a little parcel in one of the carriage-pockets:

"Hullo! What's this? A parcel! Whom for? Why, it's for you!"

"For me?"

"Read for yourself: 'Holmlock Shears, Esq., from Arsène Lupin!'"

The Englishman took the parcel, untied the string and removed the two sheets of paper in which it was wrapped. It was a watch.

"Oh!" he said, accompanying his exclamation with an angry gesture. . . .

"A watch," said Devanne. "Can he have . . .?"

The Englishman did not reply.

"What! It's your watch? Is Arsène Lupin returning you your watch? Then he must have taken it! . . . He must have taken your watch! Oh, this is too good! Holmlock Shears' watch spirited away by Arsène Lupin! Oh, this is too funny for words! No, upon my honour . . . you must excuse me . . . I can't help laughing!"

He laughed till he cried, utterly unable to restrain himself. When he had done, he declared, in a tone of conviction:

"Yes, he's a man, as you said."

The Englishman did not move a muscle. With his eyes fixed on the fleeting horizon, he spoke not a word until they reached Dieppe. His silence was terrible, unfathomable, more violent than the fiercest fury. On the landing-stage, he said simply, this time without betraying any anger, but in a tone that revealed all the iron will and energy of his remarkable personality :

“Yes, he’s a man, and a man on whose shoulder I shall have great pleasure in laying this hand with which I now grasp yours, Monsieur Devanne. And I have an idea, mark you, that Arsène Lupin and Holmlock Shears will meet again some day . . . Yes, the world is too small for them not to meet. . . . And, when they do . . . !”
